It is generally acknowledged that wartime coordination of supply and service functions was greatly inferior to coordination in military strategy and operations. In spite of various efforts to establish joint systems, each department for the most part set its own requirements for supplies, production plants, depots, hospitals, training fields, construction, personnel, and so forth, without regard to the requirements of the other. This naturally resulted in widespread duplications. Further waste resulted from separate specifications where the same specifications could have been used by both departments. Frequently the two departments bid against each other. Parallel transportation systems for supplies and personnel required extra overhead expense.

Large-scale economies can unquestionably be realized through the proper coordination of military procurement and supply. This is not to say that the problem is an easy one and that great savings can be achieved immediately by the imposition of a new type of organization. It must be recognized that the services, and for that matter the many different units within the respective services, have widely varying needs. Uniform requirements, specifications, facilities, procurement methods, supplies, and so forth, cannot be arbitrarily directed. The difficulty with the handling of the problem during the war was that by and large no effective machinery existed to examine the possibilities of savings. The two supply lines, hospital systems, procurement agencies, and transport systems mostly went their separate ways. Given adequate organizational provision for study and planning, it should be possible over a period of years to produce really substantial savings.

Proper coordination in this area would also contribute heavily to the greater efficiency of military operations. There was admittedly a substantial gap in the war between strategic planning and the logistic implementation of strategic plans. Here again a more effective organization for the integration of requirements planning, procurement methods, supply and service functions, and so forth, would have meant more effective coordination of ground, air, and sea forces in the field of operation. It was only toward the end of the war that substantial progress was being made in this direction, and it is admittedly an area in which the wartime coordinating methods can be greatly improved upon.

MILITARY TRAINING AND EDUCATION

Another lesson of the war was that combined operations of land, sea, and air are greatly handicapped by lack of understanding by the members of one service of the tasks and procedures of members of the other services. The traditional service methods of training were demonstrated to be inadequate for the combined operations that were so common in this war. Service training was strongest on special techniques and procedures and on indoctrination. It reflected the view earlier referred to, to the effect that combined land and sea operations would be required only in unusual circumstances.

The problem of remedying the defects in training methods cannot be left to the services acting separately. If the officers and members of each service are to have an adequate understanding of the relationship among the services and of the functions and procedures of the other services an appreciable amount of coordinated action will be required.

PERSONNEL POLICIES

Wartime coordination in matters of personnel policy was notably absent. As one report stated, coordinating agencies "were extremely difficult to find. Those which were uncovered were few in number, limited in scope, and lacking in authority." There was no effective coordination on any matter of fundamental importance. Yet almost nowhere was the need greater. Why should recruiting methods, promotion and pay policies, welfare policies, methods of selecting officers, policies with respect to awards, and point systems for discharge have been so markedly different?

The results of absence of coordination in this field were serious. With respect to recruitment, for example, there was duplication of recruiting personnel and facilities, unnecessary and harmful competition between the services, hoarding of special classes of personnel, and inequitable distribution of personnel within the services. Differences in welfare policies and in promotion and other matters created jealousy and friction. One of the primary objectives of a reorganization of the services must be the institution of consistent and equitable personnel policies.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

The war experience emphasized the need for two types of coordination with respect to scientific research and development, neither of which was adequately provided during the war. Within the services there was much duplication. Up to a certain point, competition in research is justifiable. Where talent and resources are limited, however, someone must be in a position to eliminate needless duplication. Military research and development are becoming more and more costly and more and more vital. Elimination of waste, either in the form of duplication or of misdirected effort, becomes increasingly important.

There is also great need of coordination of military research with civilian research. This aspect of the research problem has entered less into the discussion of reorganization than have other military-civilian problems, because of the separate consideration of a national research agency. It is, however, a highly significant illustration of the interdependence of military and civilian functions.

COORDINATION OF MILITARY AND FOREIGN POLICY

Apart from the problem of the organization of the armed forces, but closely related to it, is the problem of the relation of the military organization to the State Department. The necessity for closer coordination was apparent during the war. The need is even greater now. The problem is not simply one of the national defense; we have international responsibilities both within the frame of the United Nations and outside it. Our military policy cannot be permitted to nullify or impede our foreign policy; and, conversely, we must have such a measure of coordination that our international objectives and commitments are reflected in our military policy.

A coordinating agency in this area would naturally be advisory only. Its influence, however, could be very great. Kept properly informed of the plans and policies of the member agencies and with resort to Presidential decision in case of inability to effect agreement, a body of this sort could prevent the development of a situation in which our military and international policies were at cross-purposes.

The desirability of establishing a mechanism for coordinating military policy and foreign policy accentuates the need for first effecting a satisfactory organization of the Military Establishment. All efforts at coordination of military and foreign policies will come to nothing if we do not have a unified military policy.

A CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY

Neither the War Department nor the Navy Department had an intelligence service adequate to our needs when the war broke out. The intelligence agencies in each Department operated separately for the most part, except for the exchange of routine military and naval attaché reports. There was no real integration of intelligence at the operating level, and no established liaison with the State Department. Though funds were inadequate, there was much duplication of effort by the services.

The war brought substantial appropriations and drastic reorganization. The Office of Strategic Services was finally set up under the jurisdiction of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and acted as the central coordinating agency in intelligence matters. Later, the Joint Intelligence Committee and its subcommittees made further provision for the coordination of intelligence activities. In spite of these and other changes, however, much unnecessary duplication existed in the intelligence services of the State, War, and Navy Departments. The significance of the collection, analysis, and evaluation of information concerning foreign countries is no less great now than it was during the war. The effective conduct of both foreign policy and military policy is dependent on the possession of full, accurate, and skillfully analyzed information concerning foreign countries. With our present world-wide sphere of international responsibility and our position among the world powers, we need the most efficient intelligence system that can be devised. Organization, of course, is not the whole story. We do know, however, that there is no returning to the prewar system, where the War, Navy, and State Departments went their respective ways. We have now a central intelligence agency established by executive action. Provision for such an agency should be made in permanent legislation. It seems entirely logical that such an agency should be placed in the framework of any agency that might be set up to coordinate military and foreign policies.

MOBILIZATION OF RESOURCES

Mention has already been made of the inadequacy of the wartime system of establishing military requirements, and of the method of coordinating military procurement and supply. Even more serious were the difficulties encountered in coordinating military requirements and civilian requirements.

Time does not permit even a summarization of the evolution of the handling of this problem. It became a commonplace that this was a total war as well as a global war. The entire economy had to be organized for war, and strictly military needs had to be balanced with the needs of the civilian war economy, as well as with the needs of our allies. Eventually, the system that evolved worked moderately well, but far more satisfactory results would have been achieved throughout the war had the administrative organization been more carefully planned in advance.

In order to prevent the confusion and chaos that often existed in this war, it would be advisable to provide now an agency whose function it would be to make continuous studies and plans of industrial and civilian mobilization, in the light of military plans. It would be a joint body, composed of representatives of the agencies in the fields of military and foreign policies and of those agencies that in time of war would be most concerned with civilian mobilization problems. Only through the maintenance of regular liaison between the armed forces and these civilian agencies can we be kept in a state of preparedness.

WHY EARLY ACTION SHOULD BE TAKEN

As I said earlier, the issue of the reorganization of the armed forces is not a new one. It has been under discussion from time to time since World War I, and has been almost constantly debated during the past 2 or 3 years. The time for discussion, study, and debate is drawing to a close. If we do not take action soon, many of the lessons of the war still fresh in our minds will be lost, and we shall find ourselves muddling along with an organization grossly inadequate to our needs.

The very fact that we were successful in the war constitutes an insidious source of danger for the future. We are inclined to be boastful of our capacity to improvise a war organization after war has begun, and we cite it as proof of the superiority of the democratic system of government. On the contrary, I believe that careful and extended examination of the experience of the war demonstrates the fact that our successes were achieved in spite of the serious shortcomings of our common defense organization. Moreover, our once seemingly inexhaustible resources were seriously depleted, and we shall not be able again to fight as wastefully as we did in this war; and we should not, Mr. President. Finally, any future war would come so quickly and will be fought at such a tempo that no time would be permitted for fumbling efforts at improvising an adequate organization. To quote from the report of the Senate Military Affairs Committee of last May 13:

> Disaster at Pearl Harbor; slow, costly, and erratic industrial mobilization; limited intelligence of the capacities of enemies and allies; incomplete integration of political purpose and military objective, with consequent confusion in command; waste of limited material and irreplaceable human resources, and finally the savage potentialities implicit in scientific developments, all demonstrate inexorably, not only that the United States would imperil its national existence if it lapsed into its customary postwar apathy toward its Military Establishment, but that only the most carefully considered security organization can at once guard our safety and support our efforts to promote and maintain the peace of the world.

These are the considerations that make an early decision of this matter imperative. The facts are already available. The objectives are not in dispute. It remains for the Congress to establish the form of organization which it believes best adapted to attain these objectives. Viewed in the perspective of the infinitely complex postwar problems of security and international responsibility, differences of opinion concerning forms of organization lose their magnitude. What is of critical importance is that we decide to take the first major step in the direction of a coordinated common-defense organization. Perfection of the organization can safely be left to the future. Establishment of the basic organization cannot.

Mr. President, as I said before, long study and earnest consideration, with the hope of ultimate success, have made me more of a believer in the need of reorganization of the Army and Navy than ever.

If a bill like the one which is now before the Senate committee, or like the one we reported last year, could become law, it would do so much good for all the services and for the Nation that I am sure it would be honored in future generations as being monumental in its significance. It would also be a lasting monument to one who for some time has been connected with the military affairs of the country and who worked during the war in the Committee on Military Affairs, as well as to all who were associated in the work of that committee.

I wish to assure the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY] and the new Committee on Armed Services that I shall support their endeavors to the limit. For a long time I have entertained the belief that what has been proposed by the President of the United States should be brought about. In my opinion, he has started us on the proper course, and I am more confirmed in my belief than ever. Whatever humble service I can offer, I assure the chairman of the Armed Services Committee he will get from me.

NATIONAL HOUSING POLICY AND PROGRAM

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, on Monday of this week it was my privilege, along with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], to join with the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] in the introduction of a comprehensive bill, S. 866, directed toward the solution of what I regard as our most important single social and economic problem, namely, housing.

In my judgment, no other problem before the Congress is more important to the future welfare of this country. The necessity for the establishment by Congress of a sound, comprehensive, national housing policy and program, based upon the realities of the needs of the country as a whole, cannot be exaggerated. More than any other single factor, the character of family life, the conditions under which our children grow up and assume the obligations of citizenship, and the general attitudes of our people toward the system of Government, are determined by the character of the home and the neighborhood in which they live.

Mr. President, the strength of our democratic system of Government centers in its ability to serve more effectively than any other system the basic needs of the great majority of the people who are governed. When it fails to serve these needs, there are created the very conditions under which socialistic, communistic, and other systems of government may falsely appear to be acceptable. We are still faced with a critical shortage of housing. There is every indication that, if we fail this year to take the constructive, long-term action which the situation calls for, it will be more critical next year, and that it will become increasingly critical with each succeeding year until we face the facts and take such constructive, long-term action.

In addition to the shortage of housing, our Government has never sought to adopt and adhere to a policy of replacing housing that becomes inadequate. Our rate of house construction has been so small in relation to the needs of our people for housing that we have had to keep in use practically all our housing supply. Slums and blighted areas have spread in our cities and towns. This Nation cannot safely face the difficult years of the future with the burden of hardship and discontent which unsatisfactory housing imposes upon its people. We cannot longer accept these conditions as unavoidable.

If we are to avoid them, we must decide now that we will face the issue and assume the task of remedying the serious cumulative housing shortage, of eliminating slums and blighted areas, and of achieving, as soon as feasible, the objective of a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family. It is an objective which cannot be attained in 1 or 2 years. It cannot be accomplished by temporizing or by treating housing as a perennial emergency. It is an objective which, as a nation, we must accept and accomplish through the full use of our resources in a sound, long-term housing program.

We are late with such a program. We cannot turn back the clock, but we can avoid the price of further delay. We can accept now, as the only satisfactory objective for a truly democratic system of government, the goal of a decent home and suitable living environment for all its citizens. I believe that by the enactment of the comprehensive housing bill, introduced this week, this Congress can provide the means for assuring orderly and sustained progress in the attainment of that objective. I believe that, by such action, this Congress can provide the strongest and most effective bulwark against the inroads of socialism, communism, and all the other "isms."

This bill has its origin in a resolution introduced on March 1, 1943, by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] for himself, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]. The latter two Senators were, at that time, the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee and the chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, respectively. These were the two standing committees of the Senate which traditionally had jurisdiction of housing matters.

That resolution called for the establishment of a special committee of three members from each of these two standing commitees of the Senate. It directed this special committee to investigate and study every phase of the housing problem and the housing activities of the Federal Government. It directed the special committee to prepare a comprehensive postwar housing program—with special reference to the encouragement of home ownership, of eliminating slums and blighted areas, and the extent of the necessity of the Federal Government subsidizing housing for lower-income groups. The resolution went to the Education and Labor Committee, on which the senior Senator from Ohio was then serving, and was favorably reported to the Senate.

At that time the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the then majority leader, indicated that he did not desire to set up special committees for every postwar subject and that, since we were then creating the Committee on Postwar Economic Policy and Planning, the so-called George committee, he preferred that committee to handle the matter. When the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] was advised of these circumstances, he appointed the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], who was a member of the Postwar Economic Policy and Planning Committee, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing and Urban Redevelopment. The Senator from Ohio asked the chairman of the Banking and Currency and Education and Labor Committees each to appoint three members to the subcommittee. Senators Wagner, Radcliffe, and Ball were appointed from the Banking and Currency Committee, and when Senator BALL retired from the Banking and Currency Committee in 1945, he was succeeded by Senator BUCK. The chairman of the Education and Labor Committee appointed Senators CHAVEZ, La Follette and myself.

Beginning in the middle of 1944, this subcommittee commenced an examination of every aspect of the housing problem. We communicated with every type of major organization concerned with housing from the financing, construction, management, or consumer standpoint. Beginning in the early part of 1945, we held extensive hearings. Testimony was presented by every source of informed opinion, including private enterprise, public-interest organizations, and representatives of Federal, State, and local governments. In August of 1945, the subcommittee presented a unanimous report setting forth its recommendations for the kind of a comprehensive postwar housing program which, in its judgment, was clearly required to meet the housing needs of the country.

On the basis of this study and investigation and the recommendations of the subcommittee, and after many meetings to reconcile specific methods and details in a search for the means best suited to accomplish the desired objective, a comprehensive housing bill to carry out the recommendations of the subcommittee was introduced in November 1945. Following its introduction the Committee on Banking and Currency conducted hearings for a period of several months. Thereafter a subcommittee considered the bill further, after which it was taken up by the full committee and unanimously reported to the Senate. It was passed by the Senate without a dissenting vote, but before the House completed hearings the Seventy-ninth Congress adjourned.

Mr. President, I have dealt at this length with the considerations, studies, and investigations of the housing problem which have preceded the introduction of the bill this week, so that the Members of the Senate may fully realize how much work has already been done. The Congress now has available all of the basic facts and information needed for intelligent action.

The hearings before the Senate subcommittee and before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency indicated that the housing needs from 1945 to 1955 would call for the construction of approximately twelve and a half million nonfarm dwelling accommodations. About half of this volume was based upon the needs of the net addition of families, while the other half was represented by construction needed in order to replace, during this 10-year period, about half of the number of substandard units in our existing supply of housing. More recent estimates are even higher. Mr. J. Frederic Dewhurst, of the Twentieth Century Fund, in the hearings before the Senate Special Committee to Study and Survey the Problems of Small Business Enterprises, has estimated that 19,500,000 nonfarm dwelling units should be built during the 15-year period 1945 to 1960. In the Housing Symposium recently published by Duke University, an article by two officials of the United States Bureau of the Census estimates that the needs for housing call for the construction of from 18,000,000 to 22,000,000 units during the same 15-year period.

These estimates indicate that we must find within our resources the means for assuring a sustained annual rate of house production in excess of a million units a year. This bill seeks to make this possible.

Most of its provisions are directed toward expanding the area of the housing market which can be served by private enterprise. It would do this by authorizing a program of technical housing research to aid industry in progressively reducing the costs of housing; by perfecting the existing aids to private home financing administered by the Federal Home Loan Bank Administration and the Federal Housing Administration; by providing special supplemental systems of FHA insurance for families of lower income; by extending the principle of FHA insurance to direct investments in rental housing; and by extending aid to cities for the assembly and preparation of land in slums and blighted areas for redevelopment. At the same time, it recognizes that there will continue to be for some time families of low income for whom adequate shelter in new or existing housing cannot be provided by private enterprise. Therefore the bill also provides for a resumption of the program of aid to localities for low-rent public housing for such families.

The bill also contains provisions for a program of farm housing through assistance by the Secretary of Agriculture and an adaptation of the urban low-rent public housing program to provide similar housing for low income families in farm areas.

Finally, the bill provides for the unification of all Federal housing functions and activities under a coordinating type of agency.

Necessarily the bill is long, because it deals comprehensively with a complicated problem. Mr. President, so that the Members of the Senate may have complete information concerning the specific provisions of the bill, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a section by section analysis of the bill.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DETAILED SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF S. 866, EIGHTIETH CONGRESS (NATIONAL HOUSING COMMISSION BILL)

Section 1

This section provides a short and convenient form of citation to the bill: "National Housing Commission Act."

TITLE I. DECLARATION OF NATIONAL HOUSING POLICY

Section 101

The purpose of this section is to set forth succinctly our national housing objectives as established by the Congress and the basic underlying principles to be followed in attaining these objectives. In so doing it stresses the Nation's interest in housing production and related community development because of the basic contribution they can make both (1) toward improving the health and living standards of the people and (2) toward an economy of maximum employment, production, and purchasing power. Thus, the section calls attention specifically to the need for housing production and related community development sufficient to remedy the serious cumulative housing shortage, to eliminate slum and blighted areas, to realize as soon as feasible the goal of a decent living environment for every American family, to redevelop communities so as to advance the growth and wealth of the Nation, and to enable the housing industry to make its full contribution toward an economy of maximum employment, production, and purchasing power.

The keystone of the national housing policy established by the Congress in this title to facilitate the attainment of these objectives is that private enterprise shall be encouraged to serve as large a part of the total need as it can and that governmental assistance shall be utilized where feasible to enable private enterprise to serve still more of the total need. As a complementary policy, the section states that governmental aid to clear slums and provide adequate housing for those whose incomes are so low that they could not otherwise be decently housed in new or existing housing shall be extended only to those localities which estimate their own needs and demonstrate that these needs cannot fully be met by reliance solely upon private enterprise and upon local and State revenues, and without such aid.

In order to facilitate orderly and sustained progress in the attainment of the national housing objective, and to promote efficiency and economy, the section establishes as an additional underlying policy that the main functions of the Federal Government in housing shall be coordinated.

TITLE II. NATIONAL HOUSING COMMISSION

This title coordinates the basic housing functions of the Federal Government. In so doing, the title does not disturb the basic pattern established hitherto by the Congress with respect to the agencies who are to have the operating responsibilities for the functions and activities of the Government relating to housing, but provides for a unifying and coordinating of the housing policies and programs of these various agencies.

Section 201

This section establishes a National Housing Commission composed of a National Housing Administrator (and his administrative staff) and an advisory coordinating council composed of the Administrator, the heads of FHLBA, FHA, FPHA, and representatives of the Department of the Treasury, the Department of Agriculture, the Veterans' Administration, RFC, and any other Federal agencies that the President might designate. All of the powers of the Commission are vested in the Administrator, who is to be appointed by the President with Senate approval and to receive compensation at the rate of $15,000 per annum. The coordinating council would provide the means of working out harmonious relationships with respect to the housing functions of the participating agencies.

The section also authorizes such liaison and interagency committees as the Administrator deems necessary to confer and work with other departments and agencies of the Government and with industry, finance, labor, and State and local governments.

Section 202

This section provides that the Administrator, with the active advice and assistance of the coordinating council, is to develop coordinated housing policies and programs for the Federal Government, to interpret general policies and seek to resolve differences or disagreements that may arise with respect to the housing functions and activities administered in the agencies represented on the coordinating council, and to report to the President and to the Congress on the progress of the program and recommend legislation necessary or desirable in the furtherance of the national housing objective and policy established by title I.

Each agency represented on the coordinating council is specifically charged with the duty to cooperate actively in the work of the National Housing Commission, and to coordinate and administer its housing programs consistently with the general housing policies and programs developed by the Administrator and with their other responsibilities and policies established by law. The bill recognizes that there are to be no directive controls or detailed administrative supervision by the Administrator over the agencies represented on the coordinating council (or other Federal agencies), but that such agencies are to have full operating responsibility for the functions and activities relating to housing vested in them by the Congress.

The section further contemplates inventories, as necessary, of housing needs and progress, vesting in the Administrator the duty of preparing (with the assistance of the coordinating council) and submitting to the President and Congress estimates of national housing needs, and reports with respect to the progress being made, and legislation or Executive action, if any, needed, toward meeting such needs.

Thus, title II seeks to carry out the basic principle of the recommendation of the Taft subcommittee report, i. e., that the function of the unifying agency is not one of operations but of resolving questions within the scope of policies established by the Congress; of insuring the consistent execution of these policies; of maintaining harmonious working relationships among the several agencies and resolving conflicts that may arise in their operations; of reporting to the President and the Congress on the progress of the program; and of recommending modifications which experience indicates are desirable. It also takes cognizance of the important housing functions lodged in other agencies—notably Treasury, Veterans' Administration, Agriculture, and RFC—which should be brought within this unifying function if it is to be fully effective.

This section provides for the transfer to the National Housing Commission of property and personnel and unexpended portions of appropriations and authorizations of the National Housing Administrator under Executive Order 9070.

Section 204

This section is a technical provision authorizing the appropriation of the moneys necessary for the functions and administrative expenses of the Commission.

TITLE III. FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK ADMINISTRATION, FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION, AND FEDERAL PUBLIC HOUSING AUTHORITY

The effect of this title is to provide that with the termination of Executive Order 9070 and the present National Housing Agency established thereby, the FHLBA, FHA, and FPHA are not to revert to the Federal Loan and Federal Works Agencies, nor are the organizational patterns of FHLBA or FPHA to revert to those in existence prior to Executive Order 9070. The FHLBA, the FHA, and the FPHA therefore would become independent agencies, subject, however, to the coordinating and policy functions of the National Housing Administrator, as provided in title II of the bill.

Section 301

This section provides for a permanent Federal Home Loan Bank Administration to be headed by a single Administrator appointed by the President with Senate approval for a 4-year term at a salary of $12,000 per annum. (The first such Administrator, however, is to be the individual serving as Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board on the effective date of the act for a term coincident with the remainder of his existing term as Chairman of the Home Loan Bank Board.) The section provides that the Federal Home Loan Bank Administrator is to exercise all the functions heretofore invested in the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Board of Directors of HOLC, and the Board of Trustees of FSLIC. (As a practical matter, this vests in the Administrator only the functions of a single board since by law the members of the Home Loan Bank Board are automatically also the Board of Trustees of FSLIC and the Board of Directors of HOLC.)

Section 302

This section provides for a permanent Federal Public Housing Authority to be headed by a single Administrator appointed by the President with Senate approval for a 4-year term at a salary of $12,000 per annum. (Here, also, the first such Administrator is to be the individual serving as Administrator of the United State Housing Authority on the effective date of the act for a term coincident with the remainder of his existing term as USHA Administrator.) The section vests in the Federal Public Housing Administrator the functions, powers, and duties relating to the public-housing activities of the Federal Government. These include the prewar public housing functions consisting of (1) the low-rent housing and slum-clearance program authorized by the United States Housing Act of 1937, and (2) non-farm-housing projects of the Farm Security Administration already transferred to FPHA under the temporary wartime consolidation of housing agencies. They include also all of the public war and emergency housing functions (exclusive of those relating to War and Navy Department housing located on military or naval reservations).

Section 303

This section terminates Executive Order No. 9070 of February 24, 1942, which created the existing National Housing Agency and also provides that the constituent units of that Agency, FHLBA, FHA, and FPHA, are not to revert to the Federal Loan and Federal Works Agencies but are to become independent agencies, subject to the coordinating and policy functions of the National Housing Administrator, as provided in title II.

Section 304

This section provides for the preservation of all rights under existing obligations and contracts made in connection with any of the functions being transferred under the bill, and for the continuance of all rules and regulations issued in respect of any such functions until modified or repealed by appropriate administrative action.

TITLE IV. HOUSING RESEARCH

The purpose of this title is to authorize a program of housing research and of encouragement of local community study of local housing needs and markets and of improvement in local planning, in order to assist in increasing the production of better housing and progressively reducing housing costs, and in making available data on national housing needs, demand, and supply.

Section 401

This section authorizes the National Housing Administrator to undertake a program of technical research and related studies which wil stimulate the increased production of housing and make possible progressive reductions in housing costs.

The section further authorizes the National Housing Administrator to encourage localities to make studies, surveys, and plans with respect to their own housing needs, markets, and development, and to provide them (where requested and needed) with technical advice and guidance for these purposes.

Section 402

This section provides that such research and studies shall, where feasible, draw upon or be undertaken cooperatively with other Federal and local governmental agencies, and that the results of such research and studies may be disseminated in such form as may be most useful to industry and to the general public.

Section 403

The title provides no specific money authorizations but authorizes the appropriation of such sums as may be necessary to carry out its purposes.

TITLE V. EXISTING HOME OWNERSHIP AND RENTAL HOUSING AIDS

The basic purpose of this title is to strengthen the already existing housing tools of the Federal Home Loan Bank Administration and the Federal Housing Administration so as to enable them to service the moderate-income groups and veterans more effectively than they are able to under present statutory provisions. Toward this end, the title provides for improvements in the operations of federally chartered savings and loan associations, the Federal home-loan banks, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and the Federal Housing Administration.

Federal Savings and Loan Association Operations

This section expands the lending powers of federally chartered savings-and-loan associations so as to permit such associations to participate more effectively in the servicing of the over-all and varied housing needs of this country. This section would:

1. Authorize Federals to participate in the FHA insurance program without restriction. (At present Federals are not authorized to make home repair or modernization loans insured by FHA unless they are also secured by first mortgage; or home-mortgage loans insured by FHA unless the dwelling is within a 50-mile radius of the home office; or, except to a limited extent, rental-housing-project loans insured by FHA under its section 207 program. The section, in removing these restrictions, would remove them also with respect to mortgages which FHA has made a commitment to insure.)

2. Permit Federals to participate without restriction also in the Federal home-loan guaranty and insurance program for veterans provided by the GI bill of rights, and in any other home-loan insurance or guaranty program of a Federal agency. (The GI bill of rights itself has already provided for such participation with respect to any loan, at least 20 percent of which is guaranteed by the Veterans' Administrator. It failed, however, to make any such provision with respect to loans insured under that act. Section 501 would make this provision and would eliminate similar problems in the future with respect to any other program of Federal insurance or guaranty of home loans.)

3. Authorize federals to purchase obligations fully guaranteed by the United States, obligations issued jointly by the Federal Home Loan banks, and obligations issued by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. (At present, Federals may, with respect to Government obligations, purchase only direct obligations of the United States, and, with respect to Federal Home Loan banks, purchase only those issued by individual banks. There is no present authorization with respect to purchase of FSLIC obligations.)

Section 502

This section authorizes Federal Savings and Loan Associations, with FHLBA and FSLIC approval, to convert into State chartered associations upon an equitable basis.

Section 503

Federal Home Loan Bank Operations

The purpose of subsection (a) is to remove present restrictions relating to participation by the bank system and its members in the FHA insurance and Veterans' Administrator home loan guaranty and insurance programs and any other home loan insurance or guaranty program of a Federal agency. Specifically, it permits such banks to accept as collateral for advances to member home-financing institutions any home loan insured or guaranteed, or as to which a commitment to insure or guarantee has been made, by the FHA, Veterans' Administrator, or other Federal agency. As in the case of those FHA insured mortgages which are already eligible as collateral under present statutory provisions, such advances would be authorized in amounts not exceeding 90 percent of the unpaid principal of the loan being used as collateral. (Under present law, home loan banks may not accept as collateral for their advances loans insured by FHA under its title I home repair and modernization program; rental housing mortgages insured by FHA under its section 207 program; or home loans with more than 20 years maturity insured by FHA under its section 203 program. Nor may they presently accept as collateral home-repair loans to veterans guaranteed by the Veterans' Administrator, or second-mortgage loans guaranteed by such Administrator.)

Subsection (b) would encourage and facilitate the making of home loans with longer than 20-year maturities by Federal home loan bank members by authorizing the banks to make advances to such members on home-mortgage loans (whether or not FHA insured) with maturities of up to 25 years, as contrasted with a present limitation of 20 years.

Section 504

This section would amend the present statutory provision requiring semiannual examination of the Federal home loan banks by FHLBA so as to require only annual examination. Under this amendment, FHLBA would still have the power, as at present, to examine the banks at any time, but would not be required to do so more than once a year. This change, therefore, while preserving all essential authority, would make possible substantial savings both in money and personnel.

Section 505

This section would make Federal offenses of burglary and similar crimes committed against any savings and loan association, savings bank, or life insurance company which is a member of the Home Loan Bank System or insured by FSLIC.

Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation Operations

This section provides for certain basic changes in the financial operations of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. When FSLIC was established in 1934, its entire capital stock in the amount of $100,000,000 was provided by HOLC, and the statute providing for such capital subscription required that FSLIC pay to HOLC an annual dividend at a rate equal to the interest rate on the bonds issued by HOLC to provide the funds for the subscription. The bonds so issued bore an interest rate of 3 percent, so that this has determined the amount of the annual dividend to HOLC to date. However, these 3-percent bonds have been refunded, with the result that the cost to HOLC on its capital subscription to FSLIC is now less than the amount the statute requires FSLIC to pay in dividends to HOLC. Subsection (a) of this section would correct this situation by providing that henceforth such dividends shall be in line with the current cost to HOLC on its borrowings.

The purpose of subsection (b) is to strengthen the insurance protection afforded by FSLIC by authorizing (but not requiring) the Treasury to purchase FSLIC's debentures. In this way, there is better assurance that FSLIC will at all times be able to meet its insurance obligations without undue difficulty. The subsection limits the aggregate amount of debentures that the Treasury might thus purchase to three times FSLIC's capital stock, reserves, and surplus.

Federal Housing Administration Operations

This section, together with the remaining sections in title V, is designed to effect improvements in FHA operations with respect to all three of its present insurance programs, including home modernization and improvement loans, home mortgage loans, and rental housing mortgage loans.

Section 507 itself extends and expands FHA's title I modernization and improvement-insurance program by authorizing it

(1) to insure loans under this program with maturities of up to 5 years, as compared with a present limitation of 3 years, and (2), in the case of multifamily houses and institutional properties, to insure loans of up to $10,000 in amount (as compared with a generally applicable $2,500 maximum) and 7 years in maturity. At the same time, there would be eliminated from the title: (1) The present time limitation as to insuring activities under the title (July 1, 1947), and (2) the title's special war-housing provisions (insurance of loans of up to $5,000 in amount and 7 years in maturity for home modernization and improvement which would assist the war effort).

Section 508

The purpose of subsection (a) is to encourage home ownership by authorizing a maximum maturity of 25 years with respect to home mortgages on new construction generally, instead of limiting such maturity to newly constructed, single family, owner-occupied, homes costing $6,000 or under.

Because of the problems created by higher construction costs in various areas, subsection (b) authorizes FHA, with respect to any of its home mortgage-insurance programs, and subject always to the test of economic soundness, to increase the maximum amounts otherwise prescribed for such mortgages by the amounts (which may in no event exceed $1,000) necessary to compensate for such higher costs.

Subsections (a) and (b) of this section permit a pro rata refund of insurance premium where the mortgage is paid off within a premium year. Under the present statute, such refund may be made only if a new mortgage on the same property is accepted for insurance at the time of the payment of the one previously insured.

The purpose of subsection (c) is to make possible necessary protection to those undertaking home ownership and other mortgagors by authorizing FHA to permit or require provisions in any mortgage insured by it, with respect to the deferment of monthly mortgage payments in cases where the mortgagor, because of unemployment, economic conditions, or misfortune beyond his control is unable to meet such payments. Under this authorization, the maturity of the mortgage could be extended, as a result of such deferments, for a period not exceeding 3 years in the aggregate.

This section is designed to protect those veterans and their dependents who have been unable to keep up their mortgage payments during the period of military service. It authorizes the FHA to consent to the modification and extension of the maturity of any such mortgage, so long as the extended maturity within which the mortgage is to be amortized does not exceed the unexpired term of the mortgage plus a period equal to the period of military service.

Section 511

This section reinstates an expired authorization to FHA to include certain foreclosure costs among the insurance benefits in the case of mortgages covering homes of $6,000 or under. The purpose of this reinstatement is to insure continued participation by lending institutions in the financing of low-cost homes on the most favorable terms possible to the moderate-income home owner.

Section 512

Subsection (a) would perfect the provision in the National Housing Act which makes participation in FHA's rental housing program possible in the case of Federal or local public instrumentalities, or limited dividend corporations restricted by State law as to rents, rate of return, and methods of operation. It would do so by also including State regulated redevelopment and other housing corporations in this list of eligible mortgagors, and by providing as an alternative to the present requirement calling for controls by State law itself, regulation by the State banking or insurance departments.

Subsection (b) would in effect reinstate FHA's section 210 program which was stopped in 1939 and under which FHA was authorized to insure mortgages of up to $200,000 in amount on housing projects or developments constructed for either rental or sale purposes. The basic differences between the plan of operations under section 210 and under FHA's section 207 program were (1) the concentration of section 210 on the small-sized project or development; and (2) the statutory requirements present in the case of section 207 projects, but absent in the case of section 210 housing, calling for the formation of special, limited dividend, corporations and for FHA controls over management and operations.

Subsection (b) would reinstate the section 210 program by appropriate amendment to section 207 rather than by a reenactment of the old section 210 itself. It does so by making inapplicable to section 207 mortgages not exceeding $250,000 in amount (as compared with the previous $200,000 limitation in section 210), the statutory requirements calling for the formation of special corporations and for FHA controls over management and operations.

This section provides for three basic improvements in section 207 rental housing operations:

1. It perfects the present provisions with respect to the amount of project cost that may be covered by the mortgage loan. Two basic limitations provided in the present statute are: (i) That the loan may not exceed 80 percent of project value and (ii) that it may in no event exceed the cost of the completed physical improvements. However, in defining "costs" for the purpose of determining the portion thereof that may be covered by the mortgage loan, certain items such as taxes, financing charges, utilities, and other expenses are excluded. In order to facilitate the evident intent of the act to permit the insurance of a true 80-percent loan, and on the basis of experience under FHA's title VI war housing program, this section would amend the statutory definition of project value and costs so as to include certain of the presently excluded cost items.

2. It authorizes insurance of mortgages up to $50,000,000 in amount (as compared with the general limitation of $5,000,000) if the housing project is undertaken by a Federal, State, or municipal instrumentality, or a limited dividend, redevelopment, or housing corporation restricted by Federal or State law or regulations of State banking or insurance departments as to rents, charges, capital structure, rate of return, or methods of operation. It would also make inapplicable to these projects the statutory limitation that the mortgage loan may not exceed the cost of the completed physical improvements; that is, land costs may be included so long as the total amount of mortgage loan does not exceed 80 percent of project cost. These amendments would make possible assistance under the FHA insurance program to large rental housing projects contemplated under State urban redevelopment laws.

3. It would substitute, with respect to the size of the mortgage, a maximum limitation of $1,500 per room (or $1,800 where cost levels so require) for the present limitation of $1,350, and in this way permit greater flexibility.

This section would permit FHA to charge a maximum fee of 1 percent (of the mortgage loan) to cover appraisal and inspection costs on rental housing projects, as compared with the present maximum of one-half of 1 percent. This would enable the FHA to recover its actual cost of processing in certain cases where the application for insurance is withdrawn before the loan is insured.

Section 515

This section, together with section 606, eliminates the present statutory requirement that where FHA takes over a rental housing project as a result of default of the mortgagor and, through its efforts, ultimately realizes a profit on the transaction, such profit must be turned over to the mortgagor. It is not believed that the defaulting mortgagor corporation is entitled to such a gratuity but that such profit, if any, should accrue to the insurance fund to offset losses incurred in other cases.

TITLE VI. HOME OWNERSHIP AND RENTAL HOUSING FOR FAMILIES OF LOWER INCOME

This title recognizes that there are income groups which can and should be served by private enterprise rather than by public housing endeavor, but whom private enterprise would not be able to serve under existing programs even when strengthened by the provisions of title V. It, therefore, provides, in the case of both home ownership and rental housing, for a supplementing of the existing systems of FHA mortgage insurance with special aids for families of lower income who require more favorable terms than such existing systems offer. Thus, it would effectively complement title V in appreciably broadening the area which private enterprise can serve.

Section 601

This section points out specifically that title VI is not designed to supplant or alter any of the existing systems of mortgage insurance under FHA, but only to supplement them with special systems for families of lower income who require more favorable terms than can be offered under FHA's existing programs. It further states that, as basic policy underlying the title, it is contemplated that the liberalized forms of consumer credit provided shall be combined with all proper incentives to cost reduction through adoption of appropriate new materials, techniques, and methods, and through increased efficiency in production and elimination of unnecessary restrictive practices.

Section 602

This section, together with section 603, provides the supplemental system of mortgage insurance for individual family homes. It authorizes, where necessary in order to assist lower income families who could not be served under the existing FHA program, a combination of a 95-percent loan, 30-year maturity, and a maximum 4 percent interest rate. (Present maxima are a 90-percent loan, 25-year maturity, and 5 percent interest rate.) This supplemental program would be limited to mortgages not exceeding $5,000 in amount, or a lesser amount when the FHA finds that for any section of the country or at any time a lower cost dwelling for families of lower income is feasible without sacrifice of sound standards of construction, design, and livability. In order to stimulate building activity in this low cost home field, the section authorizes firm mortgage insurance commitments to builders of such housing in amounts up to 85 percent of appraised value as compared with the generally applicable limitation of 80 percent. This would enable them to build more houses at once with the same amount of personal capital, reduce their marketing risks, and effect other economies reducing housing costs.

Section 603

The purpose of this section is to provide increased insurance benefits to mortgagees in case of default in order to encourage participation by home financing institutions in this supplemental program. Under the provisions of the section, the mortgagee would receive reimbursement not only for unpaid principal as under the present law, but also for two-thirds (or $75, if that proves to be a greater amount) of the foreclosure costs incurred by it, thus substantially reducing the possibility of loss that the mortgagee assumes under the existing FHA home mortgage insurance program. This section also makes these benefits available for the supplemental program on rental and mutual ownership housing provided in sections 604 and 605.

Section 604

This section, together with section 605, sets forth the special supplemental program needed for large-scale housing projects for families of lower income. The program involves, subject always to the condition of economic soundness, a combination of a 90-percent loan, 40-year maturity, and maximum interest rate of 4 percent. Also, in order to encourage and make possible home ownership for those families of lower income who could undertake such ownership only under some plan such as mutual ownership housing, the section makes this liberalized combination of mortgage terms available for projects undertaken by nonprofit mutual ownership housing corporations.

Section 605

The purpose of this section is to provide increased insurance benefits to mortgagee lending institutions in order to encourage their participation in the rental housing and mutual ownership program provided in section 604, and also in the existing FHA rental housing program under present provisions of the National Housing Act. It therefore supplements the insurance benefits provided in section 603. It provides that if the mortgagee on any rental housing (or mutual ownership) project elects to assign the mortgage itself to FHA, instead of foreclosing and transferring the project, there shall be deducted from the insurance benefits only 1 percent of unpaid principal as compared with the 2 percent required under existing statutory provisions.

This is simply a technical amendment necessary to accomplish the purposes of section 515.

TITLE VII. YIELD INSURANCE FOR RENTAL HOUSING

This title recognizes that, while the encouragement of home ownership is a fundamental objective in our national housing policy, nevertheless there is a large segment of our population which, because of income, mobility, custom, or local conditions, requires or prefers rental housing. The section also recognizes that up until now the provision of such housing, particularly for families of moderate income, has been inadequate and that such inadequacy has in very large part resulted from a reluctance or inability under present aids on the part of institutional investors to make direct investments in such housing.

The title, therefore, provides for a special program of yield insurance, to be administered by FHA, designed to encourage direct investment in rental housing for families of moderate income by guaranteeing to those making such an investment to the extent of 100 percent of project cost, a minimum return (exclusive of amortization) of 2¾ percent per annum on outstanding investment until such time as only 15 percent of the original capital investment remains unamortized. As in the case of FHA's existing insurance programs, a self-sustaining program made possible by appropriate premium charges, is contemplated.

This section places the proposed yield insurance program under the jurisdiction of FHA, and as a title VII to the National Housing Act, which title would consist of 13 sections, Nos. 701 through 713, and provide as follows:

The proposed section 701 provides the general authority to FHA to insure (and to make commitments to insure) a minimum annual return to the investor, consisting of (1) 2 percent of the original capital investment (as amortization on such investment), plus (2) a 2¾-percent yield on the portion of the investment still unamortized as of the particular year involved.[1] Such insurance may be provided only for the period during which more than 15 percent of the original capital investment in the project remains unamortized (or, in effect, for not more than 42½ years).

The proposed section 702 sets forth as the basic requirements for eligibility for yield insurance (1) that there be a need for the project in the locality to serve families of moderate income at the rentals proposed, which need is not adequately being met by private enterprise without yield insurance; (2) that the project be economically sound and afford reasonable assurance of stability and economy, both in construction and operation; and (3) that the dwellings be properly designed and available for families of moderate income at rentals within their capacity to pay.

Subsection (b) of this section provides the usual clause as to incontestability with respect to any insurance contract undertaken by FHA under this title.

The proposed section 703 fixes the premiums and fees that may be charged in connection with the yield insurance program. It authorizes first an annual premium charge of not more than one-half of 1 percent of the investment outstanding for the particular year for which the premium charge is payable. It authorizes also reasonable fees (but not in excess of one-half of 1 percent of the estimated capital investment) for FHA examination and inspection of the project during construction.

The proposed section 704, which relates to the rents that may be charged for the dwellings in the project, requires approval of the rent schedule by FHA. The yield insurance plan provided under this title does not make the 2¾ percent minimum yield guaranteed by FHA, also the maximum the investor is permitted to derive on his investment. This is specifically recognized by the provisions of this section which provide for FHA approval of rent schedules so set up as to allow the investor a yield of 3¼ percent on outstanding investment. At the same time, however, FHA must also find that the rentals provided in the schedule are no higher than necessary to meet the needs of the families of the incomes proposed to be served.

The proposed section 705 provides that in those years, if any, in which the project yields revenues more than sufficient to provide a 3¼-percent yield on outstanding investment for that year, one-half of such additional earnings may be retained by the investor as a further return on his investment, but only to the extent that this does not result in a return for that year of more than 4 percent on outstanding investment. For the purposes of the insurance contract, the balance would be regarded as being applied to accelerating the amortization of the capital investment, one effect of which would be to reduce the life of the insurance contract. The section provides, however, that in the event the project has had operating deficits in preceding years (which deficits are not covered by the insurance under this title), the excess earnings are to be applied, first, to the reimbursement of such deficits, and, second, to the payment of any premium charges previously waived because of such deficits.

The proposed section 706 provides for the submission of annual financial and operating statements to FHA for its approval. The FHA is authorized to make such submission and approval a condition precedent to the payment of claims for insurance benefits.

The proposed section 707 provides for cash payment of properly proved claims for insurance benefits.

The proposed section 708 is designed for the situation where a project continues to operate at a loss for a substantial period, thus requiring special action. It provides that if the aggregate of the amounts paid as insurance benefits to the investor should ever equal or exceed 15 percent of the original capital investment, FHA is to have the right to take over the project against issuance to the investor of debentures having a value equal to 90 percent of the portion of the capital investment still unamortized. Conveyance to FHA at the option of the investor is authorized if the aggregate of the operating deficits (to the extent they are not made good) should ever equal 5 percent of the original capital investment. In either case the debentures issued would bear interest at not to exceed 2¾ percent per annum, have a maximum maturity of 40 years, be fully guaranteed by the United States, and have the same tax exemption privileges as debentures issued by FHA under its mortgage insurance programs.

The section also sets forth the necessary provisions for the temporary management and disposition of any projects taken over by FHA under this section.

The proposed section 709 vests in the investor the right to terminate the written contract at any time upon written notice of FHA, and it vests in FHA the authority to prescribe the conditions under which it has the option to terminate the insurance contract. The section further authorizes an adjusted premium charge in the event of termination.

The proposed section 710 creates a special insurance fund (Housing Investment Insurance Fund) as a revolving fund for meeting the payment of insurance benefits, and also of administrative expenses incurred in connection with the program, and allocates $10,000,000 to set up such fund. All income derived in connection with the program is to be deposited in the fund and all expenses, whether in payment of insurance claims or of administrative expenses, are to be paid from the fund. The faith of the United States is pledged to the payment of all approved claims for insurance benefits in the event the fund fails to make any such payment when due.

The proposed section 711 provides that no real property acquired by FHA under the yield insurance program shall be exempt from local taxation simply because of such acquisition.

The proposed section 712 provides for the issuance of such rules and regulations as may be necessary or desirable for carrying out the yield insurance program, including such rules and regulations as may be necessary with respect to maintenance and inspection of project records, or as may be necessary for effecting appropriate changes in the insurance base in the event of capital improvements or additions to the project on the one hand, or sale of or damage to part of the project on the other.

The proposed section 713 sets forth the definitions of the basic terms used in the title. Through these definitions, the section provides that the yield insurance program is open to any individual, group, or association, or other legal entity qualified to undertake the construction and operation of the type of project that may be assisted under the title. Through these definitions, also, the section makes appropriate provision for cases where the investor has a leasehold rather than a fee interest in the land on which the project is constructed. The definitions also indicate that a project may include such community and commercial facilities as are necessary or desirable.

This section amends three provisions of the National Housing Act which were intended at the time of their enactment to be applicable to FHA's insurance programs generally, so that such provisions will by explicit reference be applicable to the yield insurance program. The provisions affected are section 1 of that act, which sets forth the general administrative powers of FHA, section 4, which provides for cooperation by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in providing the funds necessary for the proper administration of FHA's various insurance programs, and section 5, which requires annual reports to the Congress on FHA activities under each of its insurance programs.

TITLE VIII. LAND ASSEMBLY AND PREPARATION FOR REDEVELOPMENT

This title authorizes a program of limited Federal aid to local communities to enable them to undertake positive and comprehensive steps for the clearance of their slums and blighted areas, so as to make such areas available for redevelopment, with the active participation of private enterprise, in accordance with sound planning principles. Two basic forms of assistance are authorized:

1. Loans, both temporary and long term (but not in excess of 45 years in any event), to finance necessary project costs to the extent funds for this purpose cannot otherwise be obtained, and at an interest rate designed to return to the Government the cost to it of the funds it obtains to make the loans; and

2. An annual subsidy where necessary to enable the land in the slum or blighted area to be made available for redevelopment at prices consistent with proper and sound land use and planning.

The title places the administration of this program of assistance for land assembly and preparation for redevelopment under the jurisdiction of the National Housing Administrator and requires adherence by him to the following cardinal principles in his administration of the program:

1. That any project assisted be related to the improvement of housing conditions in the locality;

2. That Federal assistance be confined to purposes of land assembly and preparation for redevelopment, as distinguished from actual redevelopment of the area;

3. That every project assisted be a local undertaking, locally planned, locally approved, and designed to serve local needs in every sense of the term;

4. That plans for redevelopment shall afford maximum opportunity to, and require maximum reliance upon, private enterprise;

5. That there shall be local financial cooperation and participation to the fullest extent consistent with the ability and resources of the locality, and, in any event, in an amount equal to at least one-third of the difference between the project cost and the new capital or reuse value of the land comprising the project area and also to one-half of the Federal subsidy base;

6. That adequate provision be present for the rehousing of the families displaced by the clearance of the area.

Section 801

This section sets forth the general purpose of the title, and declares it to be to assist the several States and their political subdivisions in eliminating slums and blighted areas and providing maximum opportunity for the redevelopment by private enterprise of land in such areas.

Section 802

The purpose of this section is to assure that aid to projects under this title will be based upon local determination of need and maximum reliance upon private enterprise. Accordingly, it provides that any contracts for financial aid under the title may be made (1) only with a duly authorized local public agency, and (2) only if the redevelopment plan is approved by the governing body of the locality. Moreover, such approval must include findings that the project area would not be made available for redevelopment without the Federal aid; that the redevelopment plans will afford maximum opportunity for development or redevelopment by private enterprise; and that the redevelopment plan conforms to a general plan for the development of the locality as a whole.

The purpose of this section is also to assure that all projects assisted will (1) actually conform to the locally approved redevelopment plan, and (2) be consistent with the interests of the locality as a whole. The section, therefore, provides that as a condition to Federal assistance the local public agency must agree to obligate those to whom it sells or leases the land in the project area, to devote the land to the uses specified in the redevelopment plan and actually to begin the building of their improvements within a reasonable time. The section requires that there be a feasible method for both the temporary and permanent relocation of the families who have been living in the redevelopment area and who are displaced as a result of the clearance of the area.

This section, together with section 804, sets forth the forms and degree of Federal financial assistance for land assembly and clearance projects. Section 803 itself provides for assistance in the form of loans by the National Housing Administrator. The loan provisions are premised on the expectation that the definitive financing of the cost of the project will basically be accomplished by reliance upon private capital. The section, therefore, authorizes the National Housing Administrator to make such temporary loans as may be necessary prior to definitive financing (so that they may not be made for periods exceeding 5 years following the date of the first such loan for the acquisition of land), and it authorizes permanent loans for only such part of the project area as the local public agency leases for redevelopment. Any loans made under this section (whether temporary or definitive) must bear interest at not less than the rate specified in the most recently issued bonds of the Federal Government having a maturity of 20 years or more at the date the contract for the loan is made (the "going Federal rate," which rate, however, is, for the purposes of this title, to be deemed to be not less than 2½ percent), and the permanent loans must mature within a period not exceeding 45 years from the date of the definitive bonds.

To provide the funds necessary to make these loans, subsection (b) of the section authorizes the National Housing Administrator to issue and have outstanding at any one time obligations in the aggregate amount of $500,000,000 from which amount, however, only $50,000,000 in outstanding definitive loans may be made by the Administrator on and after the date of enactment of the title, which limit is to be increased by further amounts of $50,000,000 at the beginning of each of the second, third, fourth, and fifth years from the date of such enactment.

Subsection (c) provides that, where a local public agency undertakes studies, surveys, and plans for a program of land assembly projects for which Federal assistance is authorized by this title, loan assistance may be made to such agency to aid in financing the cost of such surveys, studies, and plans and other necessary work in such preparation. Such loans would be made on the condition that they would be repaid with interest out of any funds which become available to the local agency for undertaking of the projects involved.

This section provides for the subsidy assistance that may be provided by the National Housing Administrator in those cases where such assistance is necessary if the land in the project area is to be available for proper use and soundly planned redevelopment at prices consistent with such use and redevelopment.

In recognizing the need and providing for this subsidy—"annual contributions"—the section also recognizes the need for, and immediately provides strict limitations as to the amounts and periods necessary to carry out the purposes of the title. In no event may:

1. The base used to determine the maximum amount of annual contribution exceed the difference between the net project cost and the local grants-in-aid, or the aggregate annual contribution bases with respect to all the projects of a local public agency assisted under the title exceed two-thirds of the aggregate net project costs (thus, local grants-in-aid would have to be made in an amount at least equal to one-half the aggregate annual contribution bases);

2. The contributions payable annually to any local public agency exceed an amount equal to 1 percent above the going Federal rate applied against the annual contribution base or bases;

3. The annual contributions be made over a period exceeding 45 years.

Also, at any time after 10 years following definitive financing of project cost, the Administrator has the right to substitute for th payment of subsequent annual contributions a single lump-sum payment in an amount sufficient to retire the outstanding obligations to which the annual contributions may have been pledged.

In addition to these various provisions designed to limit strictly the amount and period of Federal subsidy, the section further contemplates that the plan of Federal annual contributions be utilized to reduce the Federal loan assistance needed. Toward this end, it provides that payments under the annual contributions contracts may be pledged as security for borrowings by the local public agency, a provision which will facilitate the financing of project costs by private capital at the lowest possible interest rate.

The section authorizes the National Housing Administrator, upon enactment of the title, to enter into contracts providing for annual contributions aggregating not more than $4,000,000 per annum, which limit is to be increased by further amounts of $4,000,000 at the beginning of each of the second, third, fourth, and fifth years after the date of such enactment. The funds necessary to make these annual contributions are to be made available by appropriations of the Congress, and the faith of the United States is pledged to the payment of the annual contributions contracted for pursuant to the provisions of the title.

This section is intended to assure that the locality will bear its fair share of the cost of any project assisted under this title and that it will call upon the Federal Government for aid only to the extent necessary. Toward this end, the section provides that the local community must itself participate financially to the extent of at least one-third the net project cost. Such local participation may take the form of: Direct reduction of project costs or expenditures, by contributions made in cash or its equivalent; and public improvements and facilities in the project area which are primarily of direct benefit to the project and which are necessary to serve or support the new uses of land in the project area.

Where a locality undertakes more than one project with Federal assistance, this requirement relates to such projects considered in the aggregate.

Section 806

The purpose of this section is to provide the enabling provisions for financing operations under this title that experience under the United States Housing Act has indicated to be necessary for effective administration. The section, accordingly, provides (1) that the obligations issued by the National Housing Administrator to obtain funds for loans under this title are to be guaranteed by the United States (just as are the obligations issued by the FPHA to obtain funds for loans for low-rent housing and slum clearances); (2) that certain provisions contained later in the bill (at section 904 (2)) designed to facilitate the local enlistment of private capital to finance substantially the entire cost of low-rent housing projects at very low interest rates shall also apply to land-assembly projects undertaken under this title; and (3) that the obligations issued by local public agencies to finance the cost of land-assembly projects shall, likewise have tax exemption.

Section 807

This section assures that the financial assistance under this title shall not result in a double subsidy to low-rent housing which would give it an advantage over private housing development, by providing that any land in the project area made available for low-rent housing must be paid for by the agency undertaking the housing project.

Section 808

The purpose of this section is to give to the National Housing Administrator the technical powers necessary for the proper performance of his duties under this title.

Section 809

This section authorizes the sale of any Federal real property surplus to the needs of the Government and within the area of a land-assembly project, to the local public agency undertaking the project at a price equal to its fair value for the use specified in the redevelopment plan.

Section 810

This section, designed for the protection of labor standards, requires prevailing wages to be paid to those employed in the development of any land assembly and clearance project assisted, makes the kick-back statute applicable to all such projects and requires quarterly reports by all contractors used on the project to the Secretary of Labor as to the number of persons employed by them, the aggregate amount of their pay rolls, the total man-hours worked, and expenditures for materials.

Section 811

This section sets forth the definitions of the basic terms used in the title. Through these definitions, the section provides that no area selected for redevelopment would qualify for Federal aid unless it involves either the clearance of a slum area or the development or redevelopment for predominantly residential uses of a deteriorated or deteriorating area or a defunct subdivision or other open land whose development is necessary for sound community growth. Through these definitions also, the section limits Federal assistance to the furtherance of such purposes as: (1) The acquisition of the land in the area requiring redevelopment; (2) the removal of existing structures; (3) the provision of the utilities essential for the new land uses contemplated; and (4) the making of the land available for redevelopment at prices consistent with its proposed new uses. Aid under this title to assist the construction of any of the buildings contemplated by the redevelopment plan is expressly barred. Still another effect of the definitions is to require a redevelopment plan for the area in which the project area is situated sufficiently complete to indicate its relationship to definite local objectives, and to indicate also the proposed new land uses and building requirements.

Section 812

This section prohibits delegation by the National Housing Administrator of any of his functions with respect to the program to any now existing Federal agency.

TITLE IX. URBAN LOW-RENT HOUSING

This title provides for the resumption of the public low-rent housing and slum-clearance program needed to serve those families whose incomes are so low that private enterprise, even with the improved aids provided in this bill, cannot hope to service them. In so doing, the title sets forth various provisions calculated to assure complete consistency with the basic objectives of primary reliance upon private enterprise to do as much of the total housing job as possible; increasing emphasis on community responsibility and local initiative; concentration upon the needs of veterans and their families; enlistment of local capital to do the whole job of financing the capital cost of low-rent housing projects; rehabilitation, where in order, of existing dwellings; and a general tightening up with respect to the amount and period of Federal annual subsidy to achieve low rents. The title also contains a miscellany of technical and perfecting amendments to the United States Housing Act of 1937 that the 9 years of operations under it have indicated to be desirable.

Local Determination of Need; Tenancy Only by Low-Income Families

This section requires that, as a condition of Federal financial assistance, the local public agency must submit an analysis of the local housing market showing not only that there is a need for low-rent housing which cannot be met by private enterprise, but also that a gap of at least 20 percent has been left between the upper rental limits for admission to the proposed project and the lowest rents at which private enterprise is providing (through new construction and existing structures) a substantial supply of decent housing toward meeting the need of an adequate volume thereof. Thus, the section establishes as basic national policy that, even with respect to a sizeable segment of the area which private enterprise cannot now serve, every opportunity is to be given to it to sharpen its tools and extend its servicing capacity downward in the income scale.

As further assurances of attainment of basic aims, the section provides that the governing body of the locality must approve the provision of any low-rent housing to be assisted by the Federal Government; that, as indicated by actual investigation, every family admitted to the project must have been ill-housed or displaced by a slum-clearance or land assembly and clearance project (this requirement, however, does not apply to servicemen or veterans); and that every family admitted is actually one of low-income. Also, after admission, periodic examination must be made of the incomes of the families living in the project so that, if such income increases to the point where the family can obtain decent private-housing accommodations at rentals within its means, it will be required to move from the project.

Veterans' Preference

This section guarantees preference to servicemen and veterans where appropriate in the administration of the low-rent housing program. Specifically, as between eligible applicants, it requires that preference be given to the families of servicemen and veterans. The section, in harmony with most State laws, also provides that low-rent housing projects may serve veterans and servicemen without families and other individuals requiring low-rent housing.

Section 903

Cost Limits

This section is designed to end certain discriminations, inequities, and uncertainties resulting from present cost limits on low-rent housing assisted by the Federal Government, and to compensate for the drastic increase in building costs.

Experience has indicated that existing provisions, which place a ceiling on dwelling unit, as well as on room cost and which provide for higher cost ceilings for cities of more than 500,000 population, are inadequate or faulty in that: (1) a limitation on cost of the entire dwelling unit hampers the provision of housing for the larger-sized family of low income and so discriminates against such families; and (2) the reason for higher ceilings for our large cities—the higher construction costs in such communities—is equally applicable to our large metropolitan districts even though the central city in the district may by itself have a population of less than 500,000. The section, therefore, eliminates the limitation on dwelling unit cost (but not the limitation on room cost, so that the essential limitation on construction costs is still retained in the act), and makes the higher ceiling for large communities applicable to cities in metropolitan districts of over 500,000 population as well as to any city which itself has that population.

In order that the drastic increase in building costs, and the now apparent long-term nature of the housing emergency, may not prevent the provision of housing needed for veterans of low-income, the section (following the pattern established in title V with respect to FHA's programs): (1) provides for higher room cost limitations ($1,250 in cities or metropolitan areas of less than 500,000 population and $1,500 in cities or metropolitan areas over that population, as compared with existing limitations of $1,000 and $1,250 respectively); and (2) authorizes an increase in the cost limitations otherwise applicable by not more than $250 per room in areas where it would not be feasible without such an increase to construct the project consistent with the objective of providing housing for veterans of low income, and where there is an acute need for such housing for veterans of low income. This latter authorization is limited to contracts for financial assistance made before December 31, 1949.

In addition, to make possible greater certainty in determining compliance with the cost limitations, particularly at the time of the award of the construction contract, this section would provide that the cost limitations are applicable to the cost of construction and equipment, avoiding the uncertainties involved in making allowances for the not readily ascertainable anticipated overhead.

Because of special cost problems in Alaska, the section also has special provisions permitting higher costs in that Territory if found necessary.

Section 904

Local Financing

The basic purpose of this section is to amend the financing provisions of the United States Housing Act of 1937 so as to make possible 100 percent definitive financing of low-rent housing projects by local capital and thus in effect limit Federal lending assistance for low-rent housing to the temporary interim financing necessary prior to the issuance of definitive bonds. Essentially, this section provides that, in the event of a substantial default by the local public agency in its covenants to FPHA of a nature which would entitle the FPHA to suspend or terminate the payment of its annual subsidies to the local agency, such project is to be conveyed to the FPHA (subject to the right of the local public agency to reconveyance upon a satisfactory curing of the default), and FPHA would continue to make annual contributions to the project. This would assure both (1) that the project will continue to operate as a low-rent housing project, and (2) that those who have furnished the capital funds for its construction in reliance upon the continuance of its low-rent character, and the making of annual contributions therefor during the entire life of the loan, will have their investment adequately protected. With this assurance there is every reason to anticipate that local capital will be willing to undertake the job of furnishing 100 percent of capital cost in long-term loans and to do so at very low interest rates.

In addition to substantially reducing the need for Federal loan assistance, the section also adds new limitations with respect to Federal subsidy assistance. It does so by providing: (1) that in any year when the receipts derived in connection with the project assisted exceeds expenditures and charges, the excess must be used for purposes which will reduce subsequent annual contributions; and (2) that contracts for loan and annual contributions based on one going Federal rate may, in the case of a change in such rate, be amended so as to base the loan interest rate, and maximum contribution payable, on the new rate whenever this would promote economy and be in the financial interest of the Federal Government.

Other financing provisions contained in the section:

1. Reduce the maximum loan period from 60 years to 45 years in the case of projects where the annual contributions are limited by statute to a 45-year period.

2. Reduce the minimum interest rate on Federal loans made for projects where the maximum loan and annual contribution period is 45, rather than 60, years, from the applicable going Federal rate plus one-half of 1 percent to simply the going Federal rate.

3. Relate the going Federal rate (which determines the minimum loan interest rate and the maximum annual-contribution rate) to the interest rate on Federal obligations with a maturity of 20 years or more, rather than 10 years or more. (Experience has indicated that by considering as the going Federal rate interest on obligations with the relatively short maturity of 10 years, changes in such rate result in many instances, not from a change in the cost of money to the Federal Government, but simply from the irrelevant factor of the particular maturity of the most recently issued Federal bonds.) Such rate, however, is in no event to be deemed to be less than 2½ percent. Also, under this section, the governing rate is the one as of the date of Presidential approval of the contract for loan or annual contributions rather than the date the contract happens to be signed by FPHA and the local public agency.

4. Adapt the statutory language with respect to FPHA's borrowing authorization to the changes in FPHA's lending program that would result from the provisions of this title, by relating the gross amount authorized ($800,000,000, which amount is not increased by this bill) to the amount of obligations that may be outstanding rather than to the aggregate amount that the FPHA may issue exclusive of refunding obligations.

5. Authorize adjustments in capital costs of a project after initial completion to reflect either capital items which cease to be a part of the project or which add to the cost through additions or capital improvements.

6. Provide a clarifying definition of the term "administration." As so clarified, the term specifically includes undertakings necessary for payment of carrying charges other than those included in the development cost.

Section 905

Rehabilitation

In order to conserve the existing housing supply and to assist in the use, when financially feasible, of existing buildings instead of new construction for low-rent housing, this section authorizes a program of Federal aid for the rehabilitation of existing dwellings located in neighborhoods where the spread of blight can be prevented or arrested. The maximum amount of loan and rate of annual contributions for a particular project under this program would necessarily be somewhat larger in amount than for new construction—that is, the maximum amount of Federal loan could be in an amount equal to the cost of the project and the maximum annual contribution rate could exceed the maximum rate authorized on new construction by 1 percent of development cost. On the other hand, such assistance would be limited to 30-year periods as compared with the 45-year periods authorized with respect to new construction. Also, where appropriate, the section authorizes assistance for the leasing and rehabilitation of existing dwellings as distinguished from their purchase and rehabilitation. No special loan or annual contributions authorization is provided for this program.

Section 906

In order to make adequate provision for the special problems present in the case of projects undertaken in the Territories, dependencies, or possessions of the United States, this section authorizes a higher rate of annual contribution in the case of land and utility projects; that is, projects consisting of the provision of adequate land space and sanitary facilities for existing dwellings. As in the case of the rehabilitation program, a rate higher by 1 percent of development cost is authorized.

Section 907

Annual Contributions Authorization for Additional Program

This section increases FPHA's annual contributions authorization. It authorizes additional contracts, which may be entered into upon enactment of this title, providing for annual contributions aggregating not more than $26,400,000 a year, which limit would be increased by further amounts of $26,400,000 at the beginning of each of the second, third, and fourth years following such enactment.

In providing this additional authorization, however, the section limits the period over which these annual contributions may be paid to 45 years as contrasted with the present authorization of 60 years. Also the section limits the use of this additional authorization to the provision of not more than 500,000 dwelling units involving new construction without further authorization from the Congress.

Section 908

This section provides technical amendments to the United States Housing Act of 1937, most of which are required as a result of the substantive amendments to that act provided in this bill. One provides a needed refinement of the existing provisions of that act relating to the equivalent elimination of substandard dwellings.

Section 909

This section provides that, where a local public agency undertakes studies, surveys, and plans in preparation for a program of low-rent housing projects, loan assistance may be made to such agency to aid in financing the cost of such surveys, studies, and plans and other necessary work in such preparation. Such loans would be made on the condition that they would be repaid with interest out of any funds which become available to the local agency for the undertaking of the project involved.

TITLE X. FARM HOUSING

While assistance to families of low income in rural areas is authorized under the present provisions of the United States Housing Act of 1937, the special and different problems attaching to housing in such areas require special provisions for such housing. This title, in making these provisions with respect to farm housing (title XI does so with respect to rural nonfarm housing) recognizes the intimate relationship between farm housing and the entire farm economy and so places the responsibility for aids to provide adequate housing on farms upon the Department of Agriculture rather than the Federal Public Housing Authority. FPHA's responsibility is related therefore to rural nonfarm housing (as provided in title XI).

Assistance by the Secretary of Agriculture

This section authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to provide financial assistance to farm owners in the United States, and in Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico, when necessary to enable them to provide decent farm dwellings and related facilities for themselves, their tenants, lessees, share croppers, or laborers. (For the purposes of the title, a farm is considered to mean a parcel or parcels of land operated as a single unit which is used for the production of one or more agricultural commodities and which customarily produces such commodities for sale and for home use of a gross annual value of not less than $400.) Financial assistance under the title is explicitly limited to farm owners who are without sufficient resources to provide the necessary housing on their own account and who are unable to secure the credit necessary for such housing from other sources upon terms and conditions which they could reasonably be expected to fulfill.

Section 1002

This section provides for the assistance needed for those farmers lacking acceptable housing who cannot afford to improve their housing facilities if they are required to secure the needed credit assistance on the usual cooperative or private-credit terms prevailing in the area but who could do so on the basis of liberal credit terms. For farm owners in this group, the section authorizes loans for periods not in excess of 33 years, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 4 percent per annum, and secured by the applicant's equity in the farm. In order further to assure the use of cooperative and other private credit sources to the fullest practicable extent, the section requires that the borrower shall refinance his loan through such credit sources whenever he should reasonably prove able to do so.

This section provides for the assistance needed for those farmers whose percent income is such that some assistance over and above the long-term, low-interest credit provided in section 1002 is necessary in order to put them into a position to acquire and maintain acceptable housing and related facilities, but whose farm enterprise is capable of being redeveloped by improvement or enlargement of the farm, or by adjustment of farm practices or methods, so as to bring them within a reasonable period of time within the group of farmers in need only of liberal credit aids. With respect to such farmers, the section provides that, if the applicant undertakes an adequate farm-enlargement or improvement or adjusted-practices plan (either with or without special assistance from the Department of Agriculture) the loan assistance provided in section 1002 may be supplemented by annual contributions during the temporary period of time (which may not exceed 10 years) that the redevelopment of the farm enterprise is being effected. These contributions would take the form of credits against the installment of principal and interest due for any annual installment period and would be limited to a sum not greater than the annual installment of interest plus one-half of the annual installment of principal.

This section provides for the assistance that may be given to those farmers who do not possess adequate family-type farms and for whom there are no apparent means of providing an adequate income by a process of farm enlargement or redevelopment within a 10-year period. In order to avoid the possible danger that by establishing permanent dwellings for farmers under these circumstances, the perpetuation of the present unsatisfactory situation (which would seem to require different approaches) would be encouraged, the section authorizes only special loans and grants for improvements such as roof repairs, toilet facilities, a sanitary water supply, and other facilities designed to protect the health of the farmers and to so improve their living conditions that their situation is not a threat to the public health. Such assistance is limited to $1,000 per family unit (not over $500 of which may take the form of a grant or contribution), and to $2,000 in the aggregate to any one individual.

Section 1005

In order to facilitate the provision of decent farm dwellings generally, this section authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish, without charge (or at appropriate charge), to all persons technical services such as building plans, specifications, construction supervision and inspection, and advice and information. The section authorizes the Secretary and the National Housing Administrator to cooperate in research and technical studies in the rural housing field and also authorizes the Secretary to utilize (through the Agricultural Extension Service) the facilities of State agencies and educational institutions in furnishing the services and information authorized by this section.

This section requires that the Secretary of Agriculture give preference to veterans in administering the provisions of the title.

Section 1007

This section authorizes the use by the Secretary of Agriculture of local county or parish committees of farmers to examine applications of farmers desiring to obtain the benefits provided by the title and to submit recommendations in appropriate form to the Secretary with respect to each application.

The section further enables the Secretary to make the assistance authorized under sections 1002 to 1005, inclusive, available through the use of local public agencies authorized to assist in providing housing for families in rural areas.

Section 1008

This section vests in the Secretary the power to establish standards of adequate housing necessary for the purpose of operations of the title. It also authorizes him to require that any recipient of financial assistance agree that the housing provided with such assistance shall not be a justification for changing the terms of the lease or occupancy agreement with the occupants of such housing to the latter's disadvantage without the approval of the Secretary.

Section 1009

This section provides the various administrative and related powers necessary in order that the Secretary of Agriculture may administer the program authorized in the preceding sections.

Section 1010

This section provides that the Secretary of Agriculture is to obtain the funds to make loans under the title from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at an interest rate not in excess of 1¾ percent per annum. Such borrowings are limited to the amounts necessary to make loans not in excess of $25,000,000 during the first year, $50,000,000 during the second, $75,000,000 during the third, and $100,000,000 during the fourth year after the date of enactment of this bill.

Section 1011

This section authorizes the Secretary to make contributions or grants pursuant to sections 1003 or 1004 of not to exceed $2,500,000 during the first year after enactment of the bill, $5,000,000 during the second, $7,500,000 during the third, and $10,000,000 during each of the next 10 succeeding years.

Section 1012

This section authorizes the appropriation of the amounts necessary to make the contributions provided for in the title and for such other amounts as may be necessary for the carrying out of the provisions of the preceding sections of the title.

TITLE XI. RURAL NONFARM HOUSING

Section 1101

The purpose of this section is to authorize assistance for rural (nonfarm) families of low income comparable to that furnished to urban low-income families under the United States Housing Act of 1937. The section calls for the enactment of an additional title, specifically relating to rural non-farm-housing, to the United States Housing Act of 1937, consisting of six sections, numbered 201 through 206:

The proposed section 201 authorizes and directs the FPHA to develop and undertake a program to assist local public agencies in providing decent housing in rural areas for nonfarm families of low income. The section provides also that in this program, as in the urban low-rent housing program, preference be provided to families of servicemen and veterans.

The proposed section 202 authorizes the giving of an option to purchase to any lessee of a rural house assisted under the title. In connection with the exercise of any such option, the lessee may be given credit for lease payments which were applied toward amortizing the cost of the house.

The proposed section 203 authorizes FPHA loan assistance to local public agencies to finance the provision of rural nonfarm housing for families of low income. Such loans may not exceed the cost of the housing, must bear interest at a rate not less than the "going Federal rate" (the rate on the most recently issued Federal bonds at the date of Presidential approval of the loan contract with a maturity of 20 years or more but in no event less than 2½ percent), and be repaid within a period not exceeding 45 years. The section provides no additional loan funds for this program but simply makes available to FPHA for this purpose its existing general borrowing authorization under the United States Housing Act of 1937.

The proposed section 204 is the section that provides for the annual subsidy ("annual contributions") necessary so that the local public agency assisted may be able to make the housing available within the means of low-income rural families. Such annual contributions must be strictly limited to the amounts and period necessary. In no event may they be made for a period exceeding 45 years; nor may the contribution to be paid for any year exceed the difference between (1) the estimated annual costs to the local public agency with respect to the housing, and (2) the estimated receipts to the local public agency from the lease payments from the families housed, which payments (exclusive of any charges for utilities) are required by the section to at least be equal to the average of the annual principal payments which would be required to repay the cost of the project over its useful life. Such contributions must be reduced or terminated when no longer needed, and in the event the local public agency has in any year an excess of receipts over expenditures, the amount of such excess must be used for purposes which will reduce subsequent annual contributions. The section further provides that appropriate increases shall be required in the lease payments in the event of increases in ability to pay.

A special annual contributions authorization for rural housing is proposed by this section, under which FPHA is authorized, upon enactment of the title, to enter into contracts for such contributions aggregating $5,000,000 per annum, which limit is to be increased by further amounts of $5,000,000 at the beginning of the second, third, fourth, and fifth years after the date of such enactment.

The proposed section 205 defines rural areas for the purposes of the operations of the title and, in so doing, relates such definitions to Bureau of the Census designations. This section also adapts to the rural housing title the provision with respect to land and utility projects contained in the urban low-rent housing title (section 906).

The proposed section 206 ties in this proposed new Title II of the United States Housing Act of 1937 with the present provisions of that act, which are to become Title I.

Section 1102

This section includes the technical amendments to the United States Housing Act of 1937 made necessary by the addition of this new rural housing title.

TITLE XII. DISPOSITION OF PERMANENT FEDERALLY OWNED HOUSING

This title is designed to bring up to date the legislation already enacted by the Congress with respect to the disposition of permanent war housing and other Federally owned housing.

Section 1201

This section provides that, when the President finds that any permanent type war housing provided with appropriated funds is no longer needed for war purposes, and the local governing body finds that it would be in the best interest of the community or of the families of local servicemen and veterans to make such housing available to families of low income, the FPHA may dispose of any such project to a local public agency for low-rent housing purposes. The proceeds from any such sale would be handled in the manner provided in the Lanham Act with respect to war housing, which sets forth the provisions relating to the time for covering balances into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The section further authorizes either administrative loans or use of disposition reserves as may be appropriate, to correct war-caused deficiencies in construction. Families of veterans and servicemen would have the same preference in admission to war-housing projects sold under the provisions of this title as is provided in section 902 with respect to low-rent housing projects assisted by FPHA.

So that war and other Federal projects sold under this title may serve the purposes intended, the price of the project may consist of the payment of all the net income from the project during its useful life.

This section makes clear, however, that none of its provisions are to be construed to prevent the sale of permanent war housing at its fair value on a home-ownership basis (with preference to servicemen and veterans) wherever feasible.

TITLE XIII. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Section 1301

This section vests in the National Housing Administrator, and the Administrators of FHLBA, FHA, and FPHA, the usual administrative powers necessary for efficient operations, such as powers relating to personnel, travel, purchase of supplies, etc.

Section 1302

This section contains the standard provision providing that the provisions of this act shall control in the case of inconsistency with other legislation.

Section 1303

This is the usual separability clause.

EXPLANATION OF EFFECT OF AMENDMENTS PROPOSED BY SENATOR MORSE TO NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, last Monday in a 4-hour speech I presented on the floor of the Senate my views and proposals on labor legislation. Several of my colleagues suggested afterward that I prepare a brief synopsis or digest setting forth an explanation of the effects on existing law of my proposed bill, S. 858.

Therefore, Mr. President, I offer at this time for printing in the body of the RECORD as part of my remarks such a digest, or memorandum, as I have prepared, for the convenience of the Members of the Senate, for use at such time as they may wish to go over the address I gave last Monday. The memorandum is entitled "Explanation of Effect of Amendments to National Labor Relations Act as Proposed by S. 858."

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPLANATION OF EFFECT OF AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT AS PROPOSED BY S. 858, INTRODUCED BY SENATOR MORSE ON MARCH 10, 1947

(In this memorandum each proposed amendment to the National Labor Relations Act is first set out in full, after which follows an explanation of its purpose and effect.)

1. Section 1 of the National Labor Relations Act is amended by inserting before the last paragraph in such section a new paragraph, as follows:

"Experience has further demonstrated that certain practices by labor organizations, their officers and members, have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by preventing the free flow of goods in such commerce through strikes and other forms of industrial unrest or through concerted activities which impair the interest of the public in the free flow of such commerce. The elimination of such practices is a necessary condition to the assurance of the rights herein guaranteed."

Explanation: The purpose here is to make clear that the practices by labor organizations, made unfair labor practices in later provisions of the bill, burden and affect commerce, and thereby lay the basis for the exercise of Federal authority.

2. (a) Paragraph (1) of section 2 of such act is amended by inserting after the word "includes" the words "labor organizations, their officers, and employees or members, and".

Explanation: While it is probably true that the definition of the term "person" in the act includes labor organizations, their officers, and employees or members, it is felt that the act should specifically so state, especially since later amendments prescribe as unfair labor practices certain conduct of labor organizations and their agents.

Explanation: The purpose of this amendment to the definition of the term "employer" is to make it clear that the Board, in defining appropriate bargaining units under section 9 (b), cannot include in the same unit the employees of two or more separate employers unless the employers have voluntarily banded together for collective-bargaining purposes. Thus, multiemployer bargaining units cannot be established except with the consent of every employer in the group. The amendment enacts into law present Board practice. However, it precludes the Board from including in a multiemployer unit any employer who does not desire to participate therein, or who withdraws from an employer association.

Explanation: The effect of this amendment is to exclude from the term "employee" any person employed in agriculture, as defined in the Fair Labor Standards Act. In the current appropriation act relating to the Board, a rider to the same effect was attached. The purpose is to enact into the permanent statute what Congress has already done by way of a limitation on the use of funds, and thereby eliminate the necessity for attaching such riders to future appropriation bills.

3. (a) The first sentence of subsection (a) of section 3 of such act is amended by striking out the word "three" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "seven."

(b) The second sentence in such subsection is amended to read as follows: "The terms of office of members of the Board shall be 5 years except that any individual chosen to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed only for the unexpired portion of such term."

(c) Subsection (b) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(b) The Board is authorized to delegate to any group of three or more members any or all of the powers which it may itself exercise. A vacancy in the Board shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all of the powers of the Board, and four members of the Board shall, at all times, constitute a quorum of the Board, except that two members shall constitute a quorum of any group designated pursuant to the first sentence hereof. The Board shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed."

(d) The first sentence of subsection (a) of section 4 of such act is amended by striking out "$10,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$12,000."

Explanation: The effect of these amendments is self-evident: they (1) enlarge the Board from 3 to 7 members, (2) correct language regarding the terms of office so as to eliminate language that has already been executed (the provision for staggered terms with respect to the original Board members), (3) authorize the Board to function in sections of three, and (4) increase the salaries of Board members from $10,000 to $12,000 a year.

4. (a) Paragraph (2) of section 8 of such act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "or from adopting nondiscriminatory rules forbidding union activity by employees on company time and property which interferes with the business of the employer."

Explanation: The effect of this amendment to section 8 (2) of the act is to authorize employers to adopt nondiscriminatory rules relating to union activity on company time and property, by employees, which interferes with the employer's business. By a series of Board and court decisions, the present law is in substance the same as proposed in this amendment. It is felt, however, that Congress should declare the policy on this important aspect of industrial relations, and thereby make clear to both employers and unions that working time is for work and is not to be used for union activity that interferes with production or otherwise handicaps business operations.

(b) Paragraph (4) of such subsection is amended by inserting before the word "testimony" the words "statements or."

Explanation: In section 8 (4) of the act, an employee is protected from discharge or other discrimination because he "has filed charges or given testimony" under the act. In some instances question has been raised whether the word "testimony" includes statements given to Board agents. The proposed language is inserted to make clear that employees cannot be discriminated against for having given statements.

(c) Such section (sec. 8 of the act) is amended by adding after paragraph (5) thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"(6) To violate the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement or the terms of an agreement to submit a labor dispute to arbitration: Provided, That the Board may dismiss any charge made pursuant to this paragraph if the labor organization has violated the terms of such agreement or has failed to comply with an order of the Board."

Explanation: The effect of this amendment is to make it an unfair labor practice for an employer to violate a bargaining contract or an agreement to arbitrate a labor dispute. However, the proviso authorizes the Board to dismiss any such charge if the labor union has also violated the contract or has not complied with an order of the Board.

5. Such section (sec. 8 of the act) is further amended by inserting after the section number the letter (a), and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—

"(1) To interfere with, restrain, or coerce an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining.

"(2) To engage, or to induce or encourage the employees of any employer to engage, in a strike or in a concerted refusal to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services, in the course of their employment (A) because particular work tasks of such employer or any other employer are performed by employees who are or are not members of a particular labor organization, (B) because such employer or any other employer had refused to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees, if another labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees within the meaning of section 9 (a), (C) because some or all of the employees or any other employer are or are not members of a particular labor organization, or (D) because any other employer does not have an agreement with, or will not bargain with, a particular labor organization as the representative of some or all of his employees.

"(3) To expel any employee from membership in any labor organization holding a contract with his employer which requires membership in such labor organization as a condition of employment, because such employee has engaged in activity on behalf of another labor organization at a time when a question concerning representation may appropriately be raised; or to persuade or attempt to persuade his employer to discriminate against such employee.

"(4) To refuse, after certification as exclusive representative by the Board, to bargain collectively with the representatives of an employer.

"(5) To violate the terms of a collective bargaining agreement or the terms of an agreement to submit a labor dispute to arbitration: Provided, That the Board may dismiss any charge made pursuant to this paragraph if the employer has violated the terms of such agreement or has failed to comply with an order of the Board."

Explanation: This new subsection (b) of section 8 of the act defines unfair labor practices of labor organizations or their agents.

(a) The first unfair labor practice prohibits interference in the selection of an employer's bargaining representative. For example, under this proposal it would be an unfair labor practice for a union to coerce an employer to join or adhere to any employer association.

(b) The second union unfair labor practice section proscribes certain types of strikes and secondary boycotts. Thus subsection (2) (A) deals with jurisdictional disputes over work assignments. A union or its agents would be committing an unfair labor practice if it called a strike or boycotted; or induced or encouraged employees of any employer to strike or boycott, because any employer's work tasks are performed by employees who are or are not members of a particular union. Subsection (2) (B) similarly bans strikes and boycotts against certifications issued by the Board. Subsection (2) (C) proscribes primarily the secondary boycott called for organizational purposes. It would, however, as would subsection (2) (D), reach the practice sometimes engaged in by the American Federation of Musicians. Specifically, the AFM has threatened to strike national radio networks because an affiliated station will not hire union musicians or settle a dispute. A strike against the primary or specific employer is not proscribed.

The third union unfair labor practice covers situations arising out of expulsions of employees from membership in a union holding a closed-shop contract when the reason for the expulsion is that the employee has exercised his right to advocate a change in representatives. It is designed to reach the situation involved in the so-called "dual unionism" or Rutland Court cases. The proposal coincides with that made by Chairman Herzog in his testimony before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The fourth union unfair labor practice covers refusals to bargain by a union after certification by the Board as exclusive representative.

Finally, the fifth union unfair labor practice covers contract violations and violations of agreements to arbitrate a dispute. It is parallel to the new employer unfair labor practice proposed above.

6. Section 8 of the act is further amended by adding a new subsection, as follows:

"(c) Nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the right to freedom of speech as guaranteed by the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States; nor shall the Board find that the making of any statement of views or arguments, either written or oral, constitutes an unfair labor practice if such statement by itself or in its context contains no threat of force or economic reprisal."

Explanation: This amendment guarantees freedom of speech by employers and all other persons affected by the act. Moreover the amendment makes clear that the Board shall not find that the making of statements of views or arguments per se constitutes an unfair labor practice unless the statement on its face contains, or in the context in which it is made can reasonably be said to contain, a threat of force or economic reprisal. The effect of the amendment is to write into the statute the present decisional rules applied by the courts.

7. The caption preceding sections 7 and 8 of such act is amended to read as follows: "Rights of employees and employers."

Explanation: This is a minor change, and adds the words "and employers" to the present caption preceding sections 7 and 8 in order to make the caption consistent with the additions to section 8, especially the union unfair labor practice provisions.

8. (a) Subsection (a) of section 9 of such act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "and to adjust such grievances without the intervention of the bargaining representative if after notification such representative does not indicate a desire to participate in such adjustment."

Explanation: At present, the act specifies, in the proviso to section 9 (a), that "any individual employee or a group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer." The meaning of the term "to present" has been the subject of some litigation and doubt exists as to the role to be played by the exclusive representative (if there is one) in connection with individual presentation of grievances. The effect of the addition proposed is to enact into law the Board's rule as outlined in the Hughes Tool case (56 NLRB 981), enforced in 147 F. (2d) 69. By this addition, the law will be clear that individuals or groups within a unit represented by an exclusive representative cannot obtain adjustments of matters involving wages, hours and conditions of employment at variance with the terms of a collective agreement unless the exclusive representative first has an opportunity to participate in the adjustment. It will encourage stability and responsibility, and will strengthen the hand of the employer who wants to live up to his collective agreement, by permitting him to refer individual employees and minority groups to the regular procedure established by the collective contract rather than acceding to the demands of the minority and perhaps agreeing to something that will conflict with the contract or occasion a dispute with the bargaining agent. On the other hand, it makes clear the fact that if the exclusive representative exhibits no interest in participating in the adjustment, the employer and the individual employee or minority group may lawfully adjust the grievance.

9. Subsection (c) of such section (Section 9 of the Act) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Any party in interest, including an employer, may request such an investigation. The Board shall not proceed on the request of an employer unless it appears (1) that one or more persons or labor organizations have made a claim to be recognized as the representative within the meaning of subsection (a) or (2) that there is a bona fide doubt that the labor organization last recognized in a collective bargaining contract is the representative within the meaning of subsection (a) and the request is filed with the Board at least 30 days prior to the expiration of such contract."

Explanation: This amendment permits the employer to petition for representation elections, whether or not there are one or more unions making bargaining demands. The two qualifications that must be met before an employer's petition may be entertained are designed to preclude employers from taking unfair advantage by instituting election proceedings as a means of frustrating legitimate organizational activity. Thus, an employer has no obligation to bargain, and hence no occasion to petition, unless a union has made a claim to be recognized as exclusive representative.

Consequently, under this proposal, an employer could not petition until he had been presented with such a claim. This provision will adequately cover situations in which a union demands an exclusive contract although it admits that it has no members, or only a minority, among the employees in the appropriate unit. It should be observed that the language requires a "claim to be recognized" as exclusive agent—not a claim that the union has enlisted the adherence of a majority.

Secondly, in situations in which a union has been recognized by contract as the exclusive representative and near the end of the term of the contract seeks renewal, the proposed amendment would allow the employer to obtain an election if he has bona fide doubt as to the continued majority status of the union and if he files his petition at least 30 days before the end of the contract. The latter requirement is thought advisable in order to discourage frivolous petitions that are not in fact based on bona fide doubt but are filed solely as a delaying tactic.

10. Subsection (a) of section 10 of such act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That the Board is empowered, by agreement with any agency of any State or Territory, to concede to such agency jurisdiction over any cases arising in industries not basic to the national economy even though such cases may involve labor disputes affecting commerce."

Explanation: Section 10 (a) of the act vests in the Board exclusive authority to prevent unfair labor practices affecting commerce. The effect of this amendment is to empower the Board to agree with a State labor board that the latter may exercise jurisdiction over cases that arise in industries which, while technically within the jurisdiction of the National Board, involve matters of essentially local application. For example, disputes in department stores, lumber and coal distributors, and the like, could frequently be handled more effectively by State agencies. Under this provision the National Board would have specific authority to cede jurisdiction over such concerns to State tribunals adequately equipped to handle them.

11. Section 10 is further amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(j) The Board shall have power, upon issuance of a complaint as provided in subsection (b) charging that any person has engaged in or is engaging in an unfair labor practice, to petition any circuit court of appeals of the United States (including the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia), or if all the circuit courts of appeals to which application may be made are in vacation, any district court of the United State (including the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia), within any circuit or district, respectively, wherein the unfair labor practice in question is alleged to have occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order. Upon the filing of any such petition the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have exclusive jurisdiction to grant to the Board such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper."

Explanation: The effect of this subsection is to empower the Board to obtain a temporary injunction or restraining order from the appropriate circuit court of appeals, after the Board has determined to issue a complaint but before a hearing has been held and an order entered. The purpose is to allow the Government to seek and obtain interim relief upon a preliminary determination (sufficient to warrant issuing a complaint) that unfair labor practices are being committed and that the offending party should be restrained from continuing the practice or taking certain action pending further adjudication. Under the act as now written, the Board may seek temporary relief only after it has filed in the circuit court of appeals its order and the record on which it is based. With the Board's jurisdiction expanded to prevent unfair practices by labor, such as strikes and boycotts, it undoubtedly will on occasion be necessary that the Government have available a speedy remedy to preserve or restore the status quo.

12. Section 10 of the act is further amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(k) Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of paragraph (2) (A) of section 8 (b), the Board is empowered to hear and determine the dispute out of which such unfair labor practice shall have arisen or to appoint an arbitrator to hear and determine such dispute, unless, within 10 days after notice that such charge has been filed, the parties to such dispute submit to the Board satisfactory evidence that they have adjusted, or agreed upon methods for the voluntary adjustment of, the dispute. Upon compliance by the parties to the dispute with the decision of the Board or the arbitrator appointed by the Board upon such voluntary adjustment of the dispute, such charge shall be dismissed."

Explanation: The effect of this provision is to allow the Board to appoint an arbitrator in cases involving jurisdictional disputes as to who shall perform particular work tasks. Since time is of the essence in such cases, the Board is authorized to appoint the arbitrator unless within 10 days after notice of the filing of the charge the parties satisfy the Board that they have settled the dispute or agreed upon a procedure for settling it. If an arbitrator is appointed, and the parties comply with his award, the charge will be dismissed by the Board. If there is no compliance, the Board may proceed with its customary unfair labor practice hearing and subsequent enforcement, and in addition, under the preceding new subsection (section 13 (j)) the Board may seek injunctive relief.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be excused from the Senate for the balance of this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRICKER in the chair). Without objection, the leave is granted.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I speak to the bill, H. R. 2157, known as the portal-to-portal bill. I desire at the outset to make a few general remarks that will show the preceding labor history which, in a way, set the stage for this very bill and evidenced the need for it.

The unfortunate aspect of the present situation in the field of labor relations stems from the fact that perversions of legislative enactments of the Congress by the courts and by administrative agencies have, in the past, prevented and still prevent harmonious relations between labor and management to their detriment and the detriment of the public. The past conflicts between these bodies often have high-lighted and focused attention on these perversions.

The pages of labor-management history need not be turned back far to find a period when the efforts of union officials in unionization and activities of unions generally were often subject to vigorous judicial restraint as well as militant hostility of management. The growth and power of labor were restrained on one hand by the courts; on the other hand by hostile activities of management. Growth was slow, the fruits not always sweet.

The Sherman Act, passed in 1890, has been called the only restrictive control of labor unions ever undertaken by the Congress. This is a perversion, for the act was passed in response to public demand for the curtailment of gigantic industrial and commercial enterprises. Nevertheless, the question immediately arose after its enactment as to whether or not the Congress intended this act to apply to labor unions. The Supreme Court judicially settled this question in Lawlor against Loewe, a case in which the employers sued a union of hatters because of a boycott by A. F. of L. members for treble damages and secured a judgment of nearly a quarter million dollars. The Court thus used the Antitrust Act to seize judicial controls over unions, especially with respect to their effort to expand unionization.

Recent application of the act to the field of labor relations presents a contrast which is strange indeed. The case of United States against Hutcheson all but removes the activity of labor unions completely from the purview of the Sherman Act. Now it is possible for unions to control the movement and marketing of goods in whole areas even to the exclusion of competing goods notwithstanding the Sherman Act, as long as this control is not taken in conjunction with the employer, and the public seems to have no recourse.

In the Clayton Act, which was passed in 1914, an attempt was made to clarify and rectify the earlier perversion of the Sherman Act by declaring that the labor of a human being was not a commodity or article of commerce, and by limiting the use of the injunction. In some respects this represented the first major achievement of organized labor in its effort to exert political power. But court interpretations of this law in the Coronado Coal case and the Bedford Cut Stone case still left much to be desired from the union viewpoint. Notwithstanding the change in the antitrust law, a judgment of more than half a million dollars was obtained against district 21 of the United Mine Workers of America after a strike involving great violence. Further interpretations of this act largely restricted its application to employees or former employees, leaving outside the purview of the act persons seeking to obtain unionization or persons seeking to organize a plant. Against the latter group, injunctions were freely used. In effect, the courts refused to effectuate the intent of Congress to make lawful labor's self-help techniques.

The next great legislative attempt at correction was the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932, which guaranteed and protected unions' self-help against judicial control by means of the injunction. It was reportedly drawn by professor, now Mr. Justice Frankfurter.

One writer has stated that it simply canceled out a small host of what might accurately be called judicial perversions. Involved were strikes for the closed shop, picketing by persons other than employees or former employees, the so-called yellow-dog contracts or the anti-union promise and the secondary boycott. In effect, the act unfettered the labor movement from any serious restraint by the courts. There still remained the hostile restraints of management.

The latter restraints were canceled out by the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, which pledged the aid of the Federal Government to unions in securing independent organization free from employer interference. In effect, Congress ordered employers to cease their resistance to unionization, and at the same time, took away from these employers the right to sign up with unions of their own choosing. Thus were unions freed from the last major restraint; that of hostile management. Labor was now free to develop and exert vast political power.

It is indeed a strange and ironic commentary on these statutory assurances that at this late date the question of the right of management to state freely its position in regard to labor relations has not been finally decided by the courts. It will be seen particularly in all these controversies that the rights of the great mass of the people were never given consideration. It was management or it was labor that was given consideration.

The legislative picture is completed by the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, sometimes called the Black-Connery Wages and Hours Act, which committed the country to the maintenance of standard hour and wage practices in interstate commerce. Congress in enacting this law, was exercising its constitutional authority to unburden commerce. It did not intend that the act should be the means whereby impossible burdens would be imposed upon commerce for the benefit of labor. Again there has been a perversion.

It is a fundamental principle of law that the function of the courts is to interpret, not to enact legislation. It is equally fundamental that legislation must be construed to work reasonable, not absurd results, it being a constructive presumption that Congress intends to attempt sensible aims.

Recent decisions passed on the Wages and Hours Act have not been in accordance with these fundamental principles of statutory construction—they have perverted the original intent of the legislation.

Looking generally at this picture, Congress may well ask: "What next?" After all, we do not represent labor, we do not represent management. We represent one-hundred-and-forty-odd million Americans of every class.

From the era of unsettled labor conditions, we have moved to an era of uncertainty for management. From an era of fettered labor, we have moved to an era of free collective bargaining by labor, but with a management which, until very recently, was scarcely permitted to indicate a preference. What is the solution? The solution is careful legislative modification of the law. There should be no intention to punish—no intention to suppress—no tendency toward reprisals. The intention should be, and is, to correct the perversions in the law. A few of the corrections which must be made should be made administratively but corrective legislation is also necessary. Just as the Norris-LaGuardia Act sought to cancel out judicial preversions, H. R. 2157 seeks to cancel out interpretative perversions which have been applied to the Wage and Hour Act. All this is necessary in this complex life of the Nation to protect the interest of the public.

In evaluating any proposed legislation, we of this period are obliged to lift our sights and see its impact in the light of conditions domestic and foreign. This afternoon two Senators, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] commented on the position taken by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] on the foreign situation. So I say, in evaluating any proposed legislation it is necessary to see its impact in the light of conditions, domestic and foreign.

We should approach every problem with hope for a just solution and with no sense of frustration or discouragement.

While, in a sense, the President's recent message again places us in the valley of decision, let us feel adequate to the task. Let us, like Solomon, ask for that wisdom which will guide our steps aright. Let us remember wisdom is not found in the big noise—in the wind and the hurricane—but in the still small voice of reason and judgment.

So, in this matter we are considering, we know how important it is that we do not sit back and do nothing. What we do here will have its important impact upon the great issue of what our foreign policy shall be in relation to Greece and Turkey and the rest of the world.

A harmonious, productive home economy makes for peace at home and abroad.

Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about certain Members of the Senate.

INTRODUCTION

In the first place, I point out that a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee has done what I regard as an outstanding piece of work in connection with this legislation. I refer particularly to the work of its chairman, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], in addition to that of his colleagues, the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

The subcommittee not only labored long, but it labored hard. It heard testimony at great length from all interested parties, from labor, from management, and from Government, on the broadest ramifications of this problem. It questioned witnesses down to the most precise point, with the most conscientious care for ascertaining the truth and the facts. As is the case in connection with all great issues, they found a great conflict of human minds. Of course, they found selfishness and other qualities; but those Senators sifted the evidence with the greatest care.

On the completion of the hearings the subcommittee went at great length into reviewing and evaluating the testimony which it had prepared. Following that, it prepared what I regarded as a splendid bill and report on this situation. No member of the subcommittee had a closed mind or had attempted merely to write a bill or a report which would be in accord with his preconceived notions. I know, Mr. President, for I sat with the subcommittee for hours at a time. I also sat with the full committee during its sessions. Each man had sought the truth and the facts in the situation from whatever authoritative source he could secure them. The subcommittee then went to great pains in discussing this technical subject with the full committee, which in turn reviewed it at length.

Following a committee vote on the bill, what was then known as Senate bill 70 was reported to the Senate and placed on the calendar. Later, it was recalled at the request of the chairman of the subcommittee. Again the committee, particularly the men who had worked most closely on it in subcommittee, went over the bill to a very fine degree, screening, analyzing, evaluating each single clause of it. The full committee revised the provisions of the bill time and time again, and then reported it to the Senate, and it is now before us for consideration.

I do not mean to imply that there are not many other bills which also undergo similarly careful evaluation, but certainly in this new Congress there has been no measure, I believe, which has had the benefit of more careful judgment on the part of any committee than the measure now before us.

NEED FOR CONCENTRATING ON LARGER ISSUES

I, for one, intend to concentrate in this discussion on what I consider the larger issues, although I know Senators will be keenly interested in many specific and detailed phases of this legislation.

The distinguished chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. DONNELL] and his associates will present a very lucid and comprehensive analysis of the measure based upon his experience with it, closer experience, I believe, than has been available to any other Member of either House. Members of the committee worked into the early morning hours, meeting all comers and getting their viewpoints, listening, evaluating, and getting the benefit of wisdom wherever it was to be found.

At this time I shall concentrate on some of the broader questions involved in this legislation.

PROTECTION OF PUBLIC WELFARE

A. SIGNIFICANCE OF PART I OF H. R. 2157, "FINDINGS AND POLICY"

I call the attention of my colleagues, in the first place, to the significance of part I of the measure pending before us, entitled "Findings and Policy," and extending from pages 7 through 10 of the bill draft, beginning with the words:

> The Congress hereby finds that the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, has been interpreted judicially so as to require employers to pay compensation thereunder for activities which were not commonly understood by employees and employers in accordance with practice, custom, understanding, or agreement to be work, thereby creating wholly unexpected liabilities, immense in amount and retroactive in operation, upon employers throughout the country.

This section goes on to list the results of these portal-to-portal suits, in terms of their dangerous effects upon private industry, upon management, labor, the Federal Government, and State and local governments.

These findings are sustained by evidence presented in the portal-to-portal hearings, and they demonstrate conclusively that the real purpose back of the bill, and the real need of the bill, is the protection of the public interest and the public welfare, not the interest of this or that segment of our population but the interest of all of us.

B. VASTNESS OF PORTAL-TO-PORTAL CLAIMS

I call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that, as the committee report states, there arrived in the courts between the dates of July 1, 1946, and January 31, 1947, some 1,913 portal-to-portal cases. In 1,515 of these cases a definite amount was claimed, and the total of such claims aggregated some $5,750,000,000, including liquidated damages. This, then, indicates the immensity of the problem before us.

I recall some supplementary evidence, which did not occur in these hearings, but which occurred in another hearing which I attended. It involved the question of suits against the Government. As I recall, those suits amount to approximately $1,750,000,000. The total number of suits is approximately 1,200, of which 213 have been settled. We have not yet ascertained the amount of money which the Government has paid in those 213 cases. However, we have the promise of the Attorney General that the information will be forthcoming.

C. WHY EXTENDED STATEMENT OF FINDINGS AND POLICY

Ordinarily, it would be my feeling that there is no place in legislation for such an extended statement of "Findings and policy" as we have prepared in House bill 2157.

However, there are a considerable number of reasons why these extended "Findings and policy" have been included, and I should like to cite the reasons for them now.

First. Attention is directed to the fact that the original Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, which we are now seeking to amend, contained at the time of enactment, in section 2 thereof, a finding and a declaration of policy.

Second. In connection with such provision, reference is made to Sutherland on Statutes and Statutory Construction, third edition, 1943, page 363, wherein it is stated that—

> It has become common, particularly in Federal legislation, to include a policy section which states the general objectives of the act in order that administrators and courts may know its purposes. * * * The policy section like the preamble is available for the clarification of ambiguous provisions of the statute.

Third. The importance which has been attributed to such a provision in the Transportation Act of 1920 (41 Stat. 456, 488, 489), is at once evident from an examination of the Supreme Court case, Dayton-Goose Creek Ry. v. U. S. (263, U. S., 456 (1924)). In this case, there was involved a policy section with reference to the so-called recapture clause of the Interstate Commerce Act, section 15 (a), which was added by the Transportation Act of 1920. The Court relied extensively upon the policy section and incorporated some of its language in its decision, in sustaining the validity of the act.

Fourth. I cite also the majority opinion of the United States Supreme Court in the very recent case of United States against United Mine Workers of America and John L. Lewis, decided March 6, 1947. In this case the Court directed reference to the declaration of public policy contained in the Norris-LaGuardia act (47 Stat. 70).

Fifth. We are including an extended "Findings and policy" section in the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 in order to make unmistakably clear to the Supreme Court the intention of Congress in this matter. The Court has previously interpreted Congress' findings and declaration of policy in a manner that was not intended by Congress. It is hoped that this situation will now be corrected.

D. WHY THE PUBLIC WELFARE IS MENACED

I have stated that the "Findings and policy" section indicates that the specific reason behind this bill is the need for protection of the public welfare. We may ask what will happen unless Congress takes constructive action on the legislation before us.

Unless it takes such action, the Nation will be confronted by extensive, expensive, and prolonged litigation in the courts to determine the amounts of portal-to-portal liability. As a result of this litigation, there will be unparalleled confusion and chaos in American industry.

Plans for extension and expansion of private enterprises will be halted. Only a few days ago information came to me that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which had already committed itself to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, has said, "No; we cannot go ahead until we know the action in relation to portal-to-portal pay." Banks and trust companies have refused to lend money—and advisedly so—to industry which wishes to enlarge. Why? If successfully maintained, pending suits running into millions of dollars against a given company, would bankrupt the company. Banks, Mr. President, cannot lend your money and mine under such conditions. Those are but a very few illustrations.

Plans for extension and expansion of private enterprise will be halted. Employment will be retarded. Nation-wide industrial conflict will be promoted. There will be severe effects upon the revenues of the Federal, State, and local governments. In tax rebates alone there will be incredible losses to the Federal Treasury. Moreover, certain employers who were war contractors, will be entitled to reimbursement from the Government in the full amount of the claims they are required to pay. The liability of the Federal Government under cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts for these claims has been estimated by the Under Secretary of War at from $1,250,000,000 to $1,500,000,000.

Not only would State and local governments also suffer from the tax-rebates provision, but they would find their other taxes declining because of the decline in industrial activity resulting from these suits and from the confusion caused thereby.

These facts, then, underline the importance of our acting in the public interest to prevent these harmful consequences from occurring.

E. AMENDMENT OF WALSH-HEALEY AND BACON-DAVIS ACTS

The confusion as to retroactive liability in connection with the Fair Labor Standards Act also exists in connection with the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts, which also lack a statute of limitations. Since the State statutory periods of limitation vary, it seems essential to me that the above two acts be amended in the public interest, just as the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 should be revised.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF PROVISIONS OUTLAWING EXISTENT AND FUTURE CLAIMS

A. ONLY STATUTORY RIGHTS INVOLVED

The claim has been advanced that rights of action for accrued portal-to-portal pay are such as may not be legally divested. In answer to that, may I state that in the first place I do not concede that there were involved in these actions anything more than purely statutory rights. Therefore, the individual is not here entitled to compensation for which he had no entitlement anyway except under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

There is nothing unique about these statutory rights. In fact there are countless instances where the Government has found it to be in the public interests to deprive people of rights which were far more fundamental and more basic.

B. PREVIOUS ABRIDGMENT OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

The rights of an individual are not absolute under our Constitution, but are subject to limitations in the public interest.

Thus, the freedom of the individual is subject:

First. To the liability of rendering military service in time of war, by virtue of an individual's being called to active duty he may be required to sacrifice the fruits of his labor accumulated in the business or property. This is because the individual may have no one to whom to entrust his business or property while in the service of his country.

Second. To licensing and other forms of regulation, such as exclusion of all but those qualified, as doctors, lawyers, and so forth.

Furthermore, the freedom of the individual with respect to religion, assembly, and free speech is subject to various limitations and safeguards for the protection of society.

Rights in property are subject to:

First. As to realty, eminent domain.

Second. As to personalty, requisition for Government use.

Third. Levy of taxes.

Fourth Limitation on use, for example, nuisances are subject to ban, namely, antismoke ordinances.

Fifth. Sacrifice sale and the like, by citizen conscripted for military service, as previously mentioned.

Sixth. Regulation of value in terms of monetary exchange; compare gold-clause cases, price control, and so forth.

In the famous gold clause case of Norman against Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Co. decided in 1934 by the Supreme Court of the United States, it was held that as to the holder of a bond which required payment of that bond in gold of a fixed weight and fineness, no constitutional inhibitions were to be found in an act of Congress which altered the terms of such a contract. On the contrary, the Court stated that such a contract had a congenital infirmity in view of the constitutional power of Congress to legislate in those spheres which relate to regulating the value of money and commerce.

Attention is also directed to the Norris-LaGuardia Act, on the basis of which the jurisdiction of the courts to grant injunctions in labor disputes was removed. It should be observed in this connection that the issuance or nonissuance of an injunction under the Norris-LaGuardia Act had prospective application only. Thus the analogy, at least as to the retroactive provisions of the portal-to-portal bill, is limited.

Finally, witness what was done to the brewing industry, for example, with the passage of prohibition legislation. As a result of such legislation, a generation ago, an entire industry was wiped out with no compensation whatever given to it. Of course, in this instance, the action came about through constitutional amendment.

I cite these instances, however, as proof of the constitutionality of the legislation under consideration in the public interest.

I refer my colleagues to the discussion of this subject in the committee report, on pages 43 and 44, and ask that it be inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREVIOUS ACTION BY THE SUPREME COURT JUSTIFIES THE CONCLUSION THAT LEGISLATION CAN BE CONSTITUTIONALLY ENACTED TO PREVENT MAINTENANCE OR INSTITUTION OF THESE SUITS

Prevention of the accrual in the future of liability of the employer for pay under the act, based upon the portal-to-portal principle, is clearly within congressional power. Congress can at any time alter, amend, or repeal any provision that it may have enacted in the past.

As to the power of Congress over rights hitherto accrued, various considerations are of importance. In the first place, Congress clearly has power to alter, at will, procedural provisions of law even if by so doing it shall terminate rights previously accrued by virtue of such provisions. The judicial precedents for such authority include the cases of Norris v. Crocker et al. (13 Howard 429 (1851)) and Ex parte McArdle (7 Wallace 506 (18683)).

In the first-named case an action of debt had been brought under the penalty provisions of a statute "respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters." While this action was pending, the Congress repealed the penalty provisions. Thereafter, when the case came before the Supreme Court for its determination, the Supreme Court held such repeal of the penalty provisions to be a bar to the action.

In the McArdle case, while an appeal was pending before the Supreme Court on a petition for habeas corpus, Congress passed an act repealing the provisions of a statute which had conferred appellate jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court in habeas corpus cases. The Supreme Court, thereafter, dismissed the appeal for want of jurisdiction.

Furthermore, previous action of the Supreme Court of the United States justifies the conclusion that Congress has power to forbid (a) the maintenance of all portal-to-portal suits that are now pending in the courts and (b) the enforcement of any portal-to-portal claims which shall have accrued prior to the enactment of said legislation, in addition to those embraced in said suits. The existence of such power is, under the previously mentioned action of the Supreme Court, not inconsistent with the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which requires that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law. We do not, in this report, discuss the question as to whether rights which have already accrued to persons under the portal-to-portal principle constitute vested rights. Whether such accrued rights are vested or not, the Court's decision in Norman v. Baltimore and Ohio Railway Company (294 U. S. 240 (1935)) amply justifies the conclusion that the accrual of said rights is subject to and may be extinguished by action taken at this time by Congress under its commerce power and its power to legislate with respect to national defense. In the Norman case Chief Justice Hughes wrote:

"Contracts, however expressed, cannot fetter the constitutional authority of the Congress. Contracts may create rights of property, but when contracts deal with a subject matter which lies within the control of the Congress, they have a congenital infirmity. Parties cannot remove their transactions from the reach of dominant constitutional power by making contracts about them.

"There is no constitutional ground for denying to the Congress the power expressly to prohibit and invalidate contracts although previously made, and valid when made, when they interfere with the carrying out of the policy it is free to adopt.

"The power of the Congress in regulating interstate commerce was not fettered by the necessity of maintaining existing arrangements and stipulations which would conflict with the execution of its policy."

In this connection attention is also called to the case of National Carloading Corp. v. Phoenix-El Paso Express, Inc. (142 Texas 141, 176 S. W. (2d) 564 (1943), certiorari denied, 322 U. S. 747 (1944)).

PREVIOUS ACTION BY THE SUPREME COURT JUSTIFIES THE CONCLUSION THAT LEGISLATION CAN BE CONSTITUTIONALLY ENACTED TO PREVENT MAINTENANCE OR INSTITUTION OF THESE SUITS

Mr. WILEY. Prevention of the accrual in the future of liability of the employer for pay under the act, based upon the portal-to-portal principle, is clearly within congressional power. Congress can at any time alter, amend, or repeal any provision that it may have enacted in the past.

GENERAL COMPARISON OF PROVISIONS OF SENATE AND HOUSE VERSIONS

I have prepared a detailed analysis setting out the precise differences between the Senate and the House bills. The following are some of the major differences:

First. The House bill bans all portal-to-portal claims, past and future, regardless of whether such claims are based on activities which occurred during the "workday"—"whistle-to-whistle." The Senate uses this approach only to past claims. As to future claims, however, activities occurring within the "whistle-to-whistle" period are not affected by the Senate bill. Such activities are permitted to be treated as they have been, under the Fair Labor Standards Act. All activities, preliminary to or postliminary to the "whistle-to-whistle" period are made noncompensable, unless by custom or contract.

Second. The Senate bill has a "saving" clause, which would come into play, in the event the Senate attempt to invalidate portal-to-portal claims is ineffective. There is no similar provision in the House bill.

Third. The Senate bill provides a 2-year statute of limitations, with a 120-day period of grace. The House bill provides a 1-year statute of limitations. Sight should not be lost of the fact that

H. R. 2157, PORTAL-TO-PORTAL ACT OF 1947—

SENATE

PART I

Section 1:

Contains findings and declaration of policy on which bill is based.

PART II

(Part II deals with existing claims, as distinguished from future claims, which are treated separately in part III of this bill.)

Section 2 (a) provides that no employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under FSA, Walsh-Healey, or Bacon-Davis Acts, for failure to pay (1) minimum wages or (2) overtime compensation, for activities of an employee engaged in prior to date of enactment of this bill, unless compensable by (1) contract, written or nonwritten, at the time in effect or (2) custom or practice, at the time in effect at the establishment or other place of employment, not inconsistent with a contract, written or nonwritten.

Under this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation under FLSA, Walsh-Healey or Bacon-Davis Act, shall have the effect of changing any contract so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities (as defined in section 5 of this bill); nor shall any provision of such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any portal-to-portal activities.

Section 2 (b) declares null and void and unenforceable all portal-to-portal claims.

Section 2 (c) removes from the courts jurisdiction over any action for (1) minimum wages or (2) overtime compensation or (3) liquidated damages, to the extent that such action seeks to enforce liability based on portal-to-portal activities.

Section 3 is a saving provision to the effect that the provisions of section 2 shall not be deemed to release or extinguish claims for other than portal-to-portal activities.

Section 4, special separability provisions, are here provided, to come into operation if any portal-to-portal claim "for any reason remains valid and enforceable," notwithstanding the provisions of section 2 of the bill.

Section 4 (a) frees the employer of liability under FLSA, and Walsh-Healey Act for liquidated damages.

in the Gwynne bill which was before the Congress last session, the House version contained a 2-year statute of limitations. This was left unchanged in the Senate committee which later reported the bill. As for points of similarity, both the Senate and House bills have a section containing findings and declaration of policy; both bills, as to past claims, take the approach of banning all claims for minimum wages or overtime or liquidated damages not based on custom or contract; both bills affect claims brought under three acts, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, and the Bacon-Davis Act; both bills have a provision permitting reliance upon administrative rulings so as to permit the defense of good faith to be set up in avoiding liability for liquidated damages.

At this point in my remarks, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the detailed comparison of the Senate and House bills be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the comparison was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DETAILED COMPARISON, SENATE-HOUSE VERSIONS

HOUSE	SENATE
Section 1: Findings and declaration of policy on which H. R. 2157 is based.
(The House version makes no distinction between existing and future claims.)
Section 5: This makes all provisions of H. R. 2157 applicable not only to FLSA but also to Walsh-Healey and Davis-Bacon Acts.
Section 3: Provides that no action shall be maintained where based upon failure of an employer to pay an employee for activities heretofore or hereafter engaged in other than those activities which at the time of such failure were required to be paid for either by custom or practice at the plant or by express agreement at the time in effect.
Section 4: No court shall have jurisdiction with respect to such claims whether or not action thereon was commenced prior to the effective date of this act.
Section 4 (b) frees the employer of liability for employee's attorney's fees.
Section 4 (c) requires employee to bear burden of proof, including proof of extent of his claim, without benefit of inference. Burden of going forward with evidence of the amount of activities claimed by employee to have been engaged in shall under no circumstance be shifted to employer.	Section 2 (g) provides that as to any of the acts subject to this bill, the Court may, award liquidated damages, if it finds the violation by the employer was (1) in bad faith and (2) without reasonable ground. (This changes the provisions of section 16 (b) of FLSA, wherein liquidated damage provision is mandatory.)
	Section 4 (d) permits to be pleaded as a defense to such claim, settlement, compromise, release, or satisfaction thereof, prior to date of enactment of this bill.
Section 2 (f) provides that any claim may be settled or released, if free from fraud or duress. Assignment of such claims is prohibited.	Section 4 (e) permits hereafter the settlement compromise, release, or satisfaction of such claim, but only if such settlement, etc., contains a provision that the amount of money, if any, resulting therefrom be distributed equitably among the real parties in interest to such claim.
	Section 5 defines "portal-to-portal activities" as those activities which section 2 provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment under FLSA, Walsh-Healey or Bacon-Davis Act.
	PART III
	(This part provides relief from future portal-to-portal claims as distinguished from existing portal-to-portal claims.)
	Section 6 provides relief from future portal-to-portal claims under the FLSA by amending that act, by adding thereto a new section, section 7a, providing that there shall be no liability or punishment of an employer for failure to pay minimum wages or overtime compensation for so-called portal-to-portal activities of an employee which takes place prior or subsequent to the hours of his work day unless such activities were compensable by (1) contract, written or unwritten or (2) custom or practice, not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract, at the time in effect, at the establishment or other place of employment. Such noncompensable activities are stated specifically to include walking, riding, or traveling to and from the actual place of performance of the principle activity or activities which such employee is employed to perform.
	Under this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation under FLSA shall have the effect of changing any contract so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities; or shall any provision of such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any portal-to-portal activities.
	Section 7 provides relief from portal-to-portal claims under the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts to the same extent that section 6 provides similar relief from liability under the FLSA.
	PART IV
	Miscellaneous
Section 2 (a) provides a 1 year Statute of Limitations for all accrued claims, etc., for wages, overtime, penalties, or damages under FLSA, Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts.	Section 8 (a) amends section 16 (b) of the FLSA so as to prohibit representative actions, but does not repeal an existing provision in the provision in the FLSA so as to prohibit collective actions by an employee who is a real party in interest. An action under section 16 (b) "shall be deemed to have been commenced as to any individual claimant as of the date when such claimant is named in such action as a party thereto." No employee shall be made a party plaintiff unless his consent is given in writing, which consent is filed in court.
Section 2 (c) As to the individual claimant, this action is deemed to be commenced when he is named as a party to the action.
	Section 8 (b) makes applicable the amendment in 8 (a) to any claim under FLSA on or after the date of enactment of the act.
Section 2 (b) provides a 6 months' grace period to bring actions on accrued portal-to-portal claims not yet in the courts at time H. R. 2157 becomes law.	Section 9 (a) amends the FLSA by adding at the end of section 16 a new subsection: (c) (1) a 2-year Statute of Limitations on actions for minimum wages, overtime compensation, or liquidated damages, accruing
Section 2 (d): This provides for tolling

prior to or on or after the date of the enactment of the bill; (c) (2) provides a 120-day period of grace within which to bring actions on accrued or any claim accruing prior to the date of enactment of the bill, if such claim is not barred by any other Statute of Limitations. Subsection 3, any such claim, if based on portal-to-portal activities as defined in section 5 above, and any suit thereon, shall be subject to the provisions of section 4, above.	the Statute of Limitations in event of absence of defendant from United States
Section 9 (b) provides, similarly, a 2-year Statute of Limitations as to such wage claims when they are brought under the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act. A similar 120-day period of grace is provided. Also, a similar requirement is provided that section 4 of the pending bill be applicable to claims where based on portal-to-portal activities as defined in section 5.
Section 10 (1) amends the Fair Labor Standards Act by adding at the end of section 16 a subsection (d) (1) to the effect that neither punishment nor liability for liquidated damages under sections 15 or 16 shall be predicated upon any acts done or omitted in good faith in reliance on any regulations, etc., of the Administrator, notwithstanding such regulations, etc., are thereafter determined judicially to be invalid, or is administratively rescinded or changed.	Section 2 (e) provides that employer may plead reliance upon a court decision or administrative ruling which, if proved, shall be a bar to action, even if such decision or ruling was later overruled or rescinded.
Section 10 (2) provides similar relief from liability where the employer has acted in good faith in reliance on an administrative regulation, etc., under the Walsh-Healey Act.	Section 2 (g) provides that as to any of the act subject to this bill, the court may award liquidated damages if it finds the violation by that employer was (1) in bad faith and (2) without reasonable ground. (This changes the provisions of sec. 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act wherein liquidated-damage provision is mandatory.)
Section 11: Definitions.
Section 11 (a) provides that the terms "person," "commerce," "employer," "employee," and "wage" shall have the same meaning as when used in the Fair Labor Standards Act.
Section 11 (b) provides that the term "employer," as used in this act, shall mean contractor or subcontractor as used in the Walsh-Healey or Bacon-Davis Act.
Section 11 (c) provides that the term "employee," as used in this act, shall mean any person employed by the contractor or subcontractor covered by the Walsh-Healey or Bacon-Davis Act.
Section 11 (d) for purposes of the bill the term "Walsh-Healey Act" and the term "Bacon-Davis Act" are adopted as short titles for statutes more specifically described in this subsection.
Section 12: Separability provision.	Section 6: Separability provisions.
Section 13 provides a short title: "Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947."
Amends the title of the House bill to conform to the Senate title.

Mr. WILEY. In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say that in the matter of a global crisis which we are facing, which was precipitated by Britain's withdrawal from Greece and the Near East, I sincerely trust that there will be no extended delay in arriving at a decision, and likewise I trust that there will be no unnecessary delay in reaching a decision on the bill which is now pending. The exigencies of the present call for no Fabian tactics on this floor in this debate.

Mr. President, I now ask that I may yield to the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], who will have charge of this measure on the floor during the debate.

Mr. DONNELL obtained the floor.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me to permit me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRICKER in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Chavez	George
Baldwin	Connally	Green
Ball	Cooper	Gurney
Brewster	Cordon	Hatch
Bricker	Donnell	Hawkes
Bridges	Downey	Hayden
Brooks	Dworshak	Hickenlooper

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] is necessarily absent on state business.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] are absent on public business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, at the outset I take the opportunity to express my appreciation to the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] not only for the very kindly remarks which he has made this afternoon in respect to the subcommittee of which I have the honor to be chairman but also for the very fine spirit of cooperation and the very great help which he, as an ex-officio member of the subcommittee, and as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, has constantly extended to the subcommittee. His kindliness, his courtesy, his constant interest in the subject, and his fine judgment have materially assisted both our subcommittee, and the committee of which it is a subordinate body, in their respective deliberations.

Mr. President, I should be remiss in my duty likewise if I did not at the outset of the discussion of this exceedingly interesting question express my personal appreciation of the fine cooperation rendered by the other members of the subcommittee, including the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], and also the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], who has but recently become a Member of this body.

I may say also that the other members of the Committee on the Judiciary, and numerous other individuals, both officials and others, have shown their great spirit of helpfulness, their desire for cooperation, and their intelligent approach to the problem by assisting us in an extremely material degree. For all this assistance and kind cooperation I express appreciation.

Mr. President, at this time I ask that, so far as practicable, I be permitted to proceed without interruption in the presentation of the initial statement with respect to the proposed legislation. I shall not undertake to lay down an iron-clad rule that under no circumstances will I yield, but I am sure that the other Members of the Senate will be very cooperative in the endeavor to permit me, as was suggested earlier today by the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], to make a continuous presentation, thus preserving not only the continuity of my statement but I trust as well giving somewhat better the argument upon this question, as well as the facts, than would be possible if frequent interruptions were to occur.

Mr. President, among the measures which have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary are S. 70, an amendment thereto, proposed by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] in the nature of a substitute; an amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. O'DANIEL] to S. 70; S. 307, introduced by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]; and H. R. 2157. Included in the subjects to which one or more of these measures refer are (a) claims commonly termed portal-to-portal claims, and (b) certain other matters relating to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, to the so-called Walsh-Healey Act and to the so-called Bacon-Davis Act. S. 70, as amended, was, on February 24, 1947, reported to the Senate, and was on March 3, 1947, recommitted to the committee. On March 10, 1947, the committee reported to the Senate said H. R. 2157, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the text thereof, and an amendment to the title, and recommended that the bill, as so amended, do pass. In advocacy of said H. R. 2157, as so amended, I now address the Senate.

Mr. President, on January 10, 1947, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary appointed the subcommittee previously mentioned by me. The scope of the duties of the subcommittee was subsequently defined to be to consider and make recommendations with respect to said S. 70 and said amendment so offered as a substitute. As indicated previously, the senior Senator from Wisconsin, who is the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, is ex-officio a member of the subcommittee.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] referred to the hearings held by the subcommittee. It may be of interest to note, and I think it may be of value in the record of this proceeding to have here incorporated the fact that, beginning on January 15, 1947, the subcommittee held hearings on parts of 11 days. Statements from 48 persons on various phases of the subject matter, various exhibits, and an appendix constitute a printed volume of 828 pages which was on the afternoon of February 28, 1947, distributed, together with a report by the committee, in the Senate Chamber. On Wednesday, March 12, 1947, Report No. 48 was distributed in the Senate Chamber.

The subject matter of the pending bill may be introduced to the attention of the Senate by a brief summary of certain of the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. That act contains, among other things:

(a) A requirement, which is found in section 6, that every employer shall pay to each of his employees, who is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, wages at not less than a rate specified in the act;

(b) A requirement, which is found in section 7, that no employer shall, with certain exceptions, employ any of said employees for a workweek longer than 40 hours unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of 40 hours at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed;

(c) A provision, which is found in section 15, making it unlawful for any person to transport, sell in commerce, and so forth, any goods in the production of which any employee was employed in violation of section 6 or section 7 of the act;

(d) A provision, which is found in section 16 (a), for the imposition of penalties in criminal proceedings for wilfull violation of any of the provisions of section 15; and

(e) A subsection, known as subsection (b), of section 16 which subsection reads as follows:

(b) Any employer who violates the provisions of section 6 or section 7 of this act shall be liable to the employee or employees affected in the amount of their unpaid minimum wages, or their unpaid overtime compensation, as the case may be, and in an additional equal amount as liquidated damages. Action to recover such liability may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction by any one or more employees for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other employees similarly situated, or such employee or employees may designate an agent or representative to maintain such action for and in behalf of all employees similarly situated. The count in such action shall, in addition to any judgment awarded to the plaintiff or plaintiffs, allow a reasonable attorney's fee to be paid by the defendant, and costs of the action.

The effect of said subsection (b) of section 16 is illustrated by the following example:

If an employer employs a worker for 60 cents per hour and, in the course of a 5-day workweek, employs him 150 minutes in excess of the 40-hour workweek—that is, an average of 30 of such minutes per day—and fails to pay the employee for that overtime, the employer becomes liable to the employee for one and a half times 60 cents per hour for the 2½ hours constituted by said 150 minutes, namely, 90 cents for each of said 2½ hours—that is $2.25; and for liquidated damages in the sum of $2.25, making a total of $4.50 by reason of the employment in, and failure to pay for, said 2½ hours of overtime in that week, which total of $4.50 is three times the amount the employee would have received for working 2½ hours in his normal regular workday.

In addition, if suit be brought to enforce collection of the sum unpaid, the court shall allow not only costs of the action but also a reasonable attorney's fee, to be paid by the defendant.

The Fair Labor Standards Act was approved June 25, 1938, and sections 6 and 7 thereof took effect upon the expiration of 120 days from June 25, 1938.

Mention has been previously made of the so-called Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Acts. The Bacon-Davis Act became effective 30 days after August 30, 1935, and, as amended, is found in United States Code, title 40, sections 276a to 276c, inclusive. It requires that the advertised specifications for every contract in excess of $2,000 to which the United States or the District of Columbia is a party, for construction, alteration, and/or repair, including painting and decorating, of public buildings or public works of the United States or the District of Columbia within the geographical limits of the States of the Union, the Territory of Alaska, the Territory of Hawaii, or the District of Columbia, and which requires or involves the employment of mechanics and/or laborers shall contain a provision stating the minimum wages to be paid various classes of laborers and mechanics which shall be based upon the wages that will be determined by the Secretary of Labor to be prevailing for the corresponding classes of laborers and mechanics employed on projects of a character similar to the contract work in the city, town, village, or other civil subdivision of the State, or the Territory of Alaska, or the Territory of Hawaii in which the work is to be performed, or in the District of Columbia if the work is to be performed there; and that every contract based upon these specifications shall contain a stipulation that the contractor or his subcontractor shall pay all mechanics or laborers employed directly upon the site of the work, the full amounts accrued at time of payment, computed at wage rates not less than those stated in the advertised specifications.

The Walsh-Healey Act was enacted June 30, 1936 and is found in United States Code, title 41, sections 35 to 45, inclusive. Among other things it provides that in any contract made and entered into by any executive department, independent establishment, or other agency or instrumentality of the United States, or by the District of Columbia, or by any corporation all the stock of which is beneficially owned by the United States, for the manufacture or furnishing of materials, supplies, articles, and equipment in any amount exceeding $10,000, there shall be included certain representations and stipulations among which is that all persons employed by the contractor in the manufacture or furnishing of the materials, supplies, articles, or equipment used in the performance of the contract will be paid not less than the minimum wages as determined by the Secretary of Labor to be the prevailing minimum wages for persons employed on similar work or in the particular or similar industries or groups of industries currently operating in the locality in which the materials, supplies, articles, or equipment are to be manufactured or furnished under said contract.

With the legislative background, of which mention has been made, in mind the attention of the Senate is called to a dramatic influx of litigation, involving vast alleged liability, which has suddenly entered the Federal courts of the Nation. The cases constituting this mass of litigation are commonly termed portal-to-portal. The head of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, under date of February 14, 1947, wrote that the number of portal-to-portal cases filed in the United States courts from July 1, 1946 to January 31, 1947, was, as indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], 1,913; that in 1,515 of these cases a definite amount was claimed; that the total of such claims in all districts aggregated five billions—not millions, but billions—$5,785,204,600, including liquidated damages; and that in most of the cases there is a prayer for liquidated damages in an amount equal to the wages claimed.

The head of the Administrative Office further wrote that in 398 cases a definite amount was not named in the complaint. Mr. President, these 398 cases are in addition to the 1,515 cases. The aggregate of the two numbers, 398 and 1,515 makes up the 1,913 cases of which the Senator from Wisconsin spoke.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. I think it might be appropriate at this time in the debate to point out, and to ask the Senator if he agrees, that of the one-thousand-nine-hundred-odd cases he has mentioned not one of them is based upon either the Bacon-Davis Act or the Walsh-Healey Act?

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct so far as I know. I will put it this way, that I do not know of any of those cases which are based on either of the two acts.

Mr. McGRATH. In other words, all these cases are based on the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

Mr. DONNELL. So far as I know, that is true. I may say, however, that I cannot assure the Senator with certainty that there may not be some liability asserted under one or the other of the two acts, but I do not know of any one of the 1,913 cases in which liability is predicated on the two acts referred to, namely, the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. I am advised, and I believe reliably so, that the fact is that no suit has been brought under either of those acts. I point it out at this time because one of the contentions which will be made by some of the Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle is that the present emergency brought about by portal-to-portal suits in no way requires the Senate at this time to attempt to amend the Bacon-Davis Act and the Walsh-Healey Act, which have been on the Federal statute books and working successfully for so many years.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator. I desire to say in connection with the observations of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, who, by the way, has rendered extraordinarily helpful service, although he takes somewhat diverse views on some matters from the majority of our committee, that the letter from Mr. Chandler, of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, contains this sentence:

> We have asked the clerks to include cases brought under sections 7 and 16 of the Fair Labor Standards Act seeking compensation for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation in which the question is raised as to whether the employee's compensation has included pay for all time during which he was necessarily required to be on the employer's premises or at his prescribed work place.

Immediately thereafter Mr. Chandler states:

> The number of portal-to-portal cases filed in these courts from July 1, 1946, to January 31, 1947, was 1,913.

My inability, Mr. President, to state with certainty whether there is any liability asserted under the Bacon-Davis or the Walsh-Healey Act arises from the fact that Mr. Chandler does not in so many words say that the portal-to-portal cases to which he refers have arisen solely under the Fair Labor Standards Act, but I think it only reasonable to assume that had there been any material number arising either under the Walsh-Healey or the Bacon-Davis Act he would have so stated.

I may state further that from independent information, not of an official nature, but from a Member of the House of Representatives in whose judgment and knowledge I have great confidence, it appears that so far as he knows no suit has been filed under either of the two last-mentioned acts.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. I should like to point out at this time the apparent reason why no suits would be brought under either of these acts for this type of compensation. It lies in the simple fact that in neither the Walsh-Healey Act nor the Bacon-Davis Act is any provision made for liquidated damages. So no employee would be well advised by counsel to bring a suit of this kind save under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and so none have been brought.

Mr. DONNELL. I desire to point out, Mr. President, in response to the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, that there is unquestionably a right on the part of employees who would claim remuneration for so-called portal-to-portal activities to assert their rights under the Bacon-Davis or the Walsh-Healey Act. The mere fact that, so far as I know, no such claims have been made is not at all conclusive as to whether or not such claims have been made or hereafter will be made. I shall address myself a little later, if I may have permission to do so, to the suggestion made by the distinguished Senator as to the alleged absence of any reference to liquidated damages in each of these two acts.

I requested at the outset, Mr. President—I do not know whether the Senator from Rhode Island was in the Chamber at the moment or not—that, so far as possible, I be permitted to proceed with continuity, and I am sure that the Senator will permit me to do so insofar as possible, though, as I said, I shall not adhere to an iron-clad rule or refuse under all circumstances to yield. I hope, however, it will be possible for me to present the facts with a reasonable degree of continuity.

Mr. President, at the time of the colloquy between the Senator from Rhode Island and myself I was mentioning the fact that in 398 of the 1,918 cases a definite amount claimed by the plaintiffs was not named in the complaints, but the court was requested in each of those 398 cases, so Mr. Chandler advises, to give judgment for the amount found due.

Moreover, Mr. President, it is an exceedingly interesting and significant fact that of the 1,913 portal-to-portal cases filed in the 7 months from July 1, 1946, to January 31, 1947, 1,186, or nearly 62 percent of all of them, were commenced during the month of January 1947, and that of those 1,186 cases, 932 claimed definite amounts aggregating $3,087,095,003.

I call attention also, Mr. President, to the fact that obviously the remaining 254 cases filed in the month of January 1947, although not specifying definite amounts, were brought for such amounts as the courts might deem to be properly allowable to the plaintiffs.

Mr. President, the query could naturally occur to any one of us as to whether these suits were all centralized in one section of the country, perhaps one or two of the great industrial States of the country. I call attention to the fact that from the list of portal-to-portal cases, that is to say the list of the numbers of such cases which appear at pages 3 to 5 of the report of the committee, Report No. 48, it will be found that the States in which one or more of such suits had been filed in the 7 months' period were 44 out of 48. The only States in which none had been filed were Florida, Louisiana, North Dakota, and South Carolina. Although no such suits had been filed in the District of Columbia, two had been filed in what years ago would have been considered far-away, but today not-so-far-away, Hawaii. In New York State 336 such suits had been filed; in New Jersey, 134; in Pennsylvania, 174; in Texas, 54. In the State from which the distinguished President pro tempore hails, the State of Michigan, 212 such suits have been filed; in Ohio, 206; in Illinois, 188; in Missouri, 55; in California, 75; and in 36 other States between 1 and 62 such suits have been filed.

The estimated number of establishments covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act, as shown in an official report submitted to Congress on January 24, 1947, is 557,030. I wish to make that figure stand out, if I may. That is the estimated number of establishments covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act. In each and every one of those establishments a suit of the type of the portal-to-portal pay suits might, if the facts justified it, be filed. The number 1,913, which is the number of portal-to-portal cases filed from July 1, 1946, to January 31, 1947, is less than seven-twentieths of 1 percent of 557,030. It is, of course, impossible to estimate the tremendous extent, in numbers of suits and difficulties of litigation, and the congestion of the courts which would result if, instead of the seven-twentieths of 1 percent of the establishments covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act being subjected to such suits, we will say 50 percent, 75 percent, or 95 percent of them should be so subjected.

If the portal-to-portal cases shall be allowed to be successful and the recoveries therein shall be material, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the extent of litigation in this country as against the 557,030 establishments will stagger the imagination of lawyers, litigants, and the public.

According to a report of a subcommittee of the Business Advisory Council of the Department of Commerce dated January 20, 1947, and referred to in the report of the committee, the pending suits involve only 10 percent of the total number of employees subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act. The Business Advisory council is a distinguished body representative of the business interests of our country. As I understand, it is sponsored by the Department of Commerce. At least it works with the Department of Commerce.

Mr. President, it is appalling to consider the prospective litigation if these pending portal-to-portal cases be allowed to be maintained and if they shall be successfully maintained in large part, and if any great number of the remaining 90 percent of the total number of employees subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act shall avail themselves of similar privileges of instituting suits in the courts of our country. Some idea of the vastness of the litigation, the tremendous number of persons and interests, diversity of locations, and impact upon the national economy from such tremendous litigation may be gained from the fact that the total number of employees subject to sections 6 and 7 of the Fair Labor Standards Act is approximately 20,510,000.

I revert for a moment to the mention made by the Business Advisory Council of the fact that the pending suits involve only 10 percent of the total number of employees. It is obvious that only 10 percent of 20,510,000 employees is more than 2,000,000 employees who, according to the Business Advisory Council's figures, are involved as plaintiffs in pending litigation in portal-to-portal pay cases.

Mr. President, what is the cause of this widespread litigation? The immediate incident which apparently brought this vast flood of litigation upon our Nation was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Anderson against Mount Clemens Pottery Co., decided on June 10, 1946, and in which a rehearing was denied on October 14, 1946.

In that case the facts were, briefly, that the company was engaged in the manufacture of pottery; that approximately 95 percent of its employees, of whom there were 1,200, were compensated upon a piecework basis; that approximately 14 minutes prior to the scheduled starting time for each shift the opportunity is afforded employees, or some of them, to punch time clocks. This 14-minute period permits them to punch time clocks, walk to their respective places of work, and prepare for the start of productive work. There was no requirement that an employee check in or be on the premises at any particular time during the 14-minute interval.

The facts further were that the walking done by the employee in going from the entrance of the plant to his or her place of employment was along, clean, painted floors of a brightly illuminated and well-ventilated building.

The further facts were that on arriving at their places of work—and by places of work I mean what we in normal parlance would understand by that term, such as a lathe, or, in the case of pottery, whatever might be the machine or the device with which the individual was principally occupied, and in which his principal activity was centered—the employees performed various preliminary duties, such as putting on aprons and overalls, removing shirts, taping or greasing their arms, putting on finger cots, preparing equipment for productive work, turning on switches for light and machinery, opening windows, and assembling and sharpening tools.

Under the facts before the Court, an employee who punches in at 6:46 in the morning and punches out at 12:14 in the afternoon, punching in again at 12:46 p. m., and finally punching out at 4:14 p. m., is credited with having worked the 8 hours between 7 o'clock in the morning and 12 noon and between 1 p m. and 4 p. m., a total, it will be observed, of 56 minutes less than the time recorded by the time clocks. In this case, suit was brought by seven employees and their unions, so the court indicates, under section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act, which I have read, claiming that all employees worked approximately 56 minutes more per day than credited by the respondent in the case, and that, in any event, all the time between the hours punched on the time cards constituted compensable working time.

I shall not undertake to read all the Court's holding, but I think, in view of the fact that the decision in this case was the immediate cause, as I see it, of the filing of the great majority of these cases, it is appropriate to include something in this record of what the court held.

The Court held:

> Since the statutory workweek includes all time during which an employee is necessarily required to be on the employer's premises, on duty or at a prescribed workplace, the time spent in these activities must be accorded appropriate compensation.

The Court further said:

> It follows that the time spent in walking to work on the employer's premises, after the time clocks were punched, involved physical or mental exertion (whether burdensome or not) controlled or required by the employer and pursued necessarily and primarily for the benefit of the employer and his business.

The Court cited two very well known and important decisions, the first being Tennessee Coal, Iron & Railroad Co. v. Muscoda Local No. 123 (321 U. S. 590, 598; 88 L. Ed. 949 956; 64 S. Ct. 698; 152 ALR 1014); and the second being Jewell Ridge Coal Corp. v. Local No. 6167, United Mine Workers (325 U. S. 161, 164–166; 89 L. Ed. 1534, 1537–1539; 65 S. Ct. 1063).

Then the Court, after citing those cases, said:

> Works of that character—

That is to say, Mr. President, work such as the exertion spent in walking to work on the employer's premises—> must be included in the statutory workweek and compensated accordingly, regardless of contrary custom or contract.

The Court called attention to the fact that the application of a de minimis rule was not precluded where the minimum walking time was such as to be negligible.

So up to this point we find that under those circumstances in this manufacturing establishment where the walking done by the employees, as I have indicated, was along clean, painted floors of a brilliantly illuminated and well-ventilated building, the Court holds that the walking is an activity which is compensable under the Fair Labor Standards Act, regardless of contrary custom, or contract.

I have pointed out that the Court said that the walking was along clean, painted floors of a brightly illuminated and well-ventilated building, because of the great contrast between those conditions and the conditions cited in the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. case and the Jewell Ridge case, where miners were operating down below the surface of the earth, dropping to their work in shafts, crowded together in cars, and moving through poorly ventilated, hot, smelly, and insanitary surroundings in the mines, I should judge from the description.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the Mount Clemens case the doctrines set forth in the Jewell Ridge and Tennessee Coal & Iron cases were extended out of the subterranean recesses of the earth up into bright, illuminated, and well-ventilated surroundings.

So much for the walking done by the employees, and for which the Court held that compensation must be made regardless of contrary custom or contract.

Then the Court proceeded to consider further facts. I have mentioned activities such as putting on aprons and overalls. Let me read a few sentences of the Court's holding with respect to those activities. After having discussed the matter of walking from the entrance to the place of their productive work, the Court said:

> The employees proved, in addition, that they pursued certain preliminary activities after arriving at their places of work, such as putting on aprons and overalls, removing shirts, taping or greasing arms, putting on finger cots, preparing the equipment for productive work, turning on switches for lights and machinery, opening windows, and assembling and sharpening tools.

I continue reading from the Court's decision, as follows:

> These activities are clearly work falling within the definition enunciated and applied in the Tennessee Coal and Jewell Ridge cases. They involve exertion of a physical nature, controlled or required by the employer and pursued necessarily and primarily for the employer's benefit. They are performed solely on the employer's premises and are a necessary prerequisite to productive work. There is nothing in such activities that partakes only of the personal convenience or needs of the employees. Hence they constitute work that must be accorded appropriate compensation under the statute.

Citing two cases, each in the Federal Supplement.

Then the Court concluded the paragraph by saying:

Here, again, however, it is appropriate to apply the de minimis doctrine so that insubstantial and insignificant periods of time spent in preliminary activities need not be included in the statutory workweek.

Mr. President, in addition to those holdings of the Court in the Mount Clemens case, by which, on the one hand, the walking from the entrance to the place of productive work was determined to be compensable under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and in addition to the holding of the Court that the preliminary activities of the kind which I have recited and which the Court recited are likewise compensable, the Court then addressed itself to a third proposition which is of extreme importance, because of the tremendously great urge and encouragement which the language of the Court holds out to any prospective litigant who desires to offer himself to the Court as a willing recipient of some of these items of compensation. I refer, Mr. President, to the holding of the Court as to the burden of proof. I undertake to say that, generally speaking, unless there be some extraordinary situation which justifies a contrary holding, the burden of proof rests, throughout our jurisprudence, upon the plaintiff in the case. He who asserts a right must prove that right. I read what the Court held in the Mount Clemens case with respect to those claims:

An employee who brings suit under section 16 (b) of the act for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation, together with liquidated damages, has the burden of proving that he performed work for which he was not properly compensated. The remedial nature of this statute and the great public policy which it embodies, however, militate against making that burden an impossible hurdle for the employee. Due regard must be given to the fact that it is the employer who has the duty under section 11 (c) of the act—to keep proper records of wages, hours, and other conditions and practices of employment and who is in position to know and to produce the most probative facts concerning the nature and amount of work performed.

Continuing, the Court said:

Employees seldom keep such records themselves; even if they do, the records may be, and frequently are, untrustworthy. It is in this setting that a proper and fair standard must be erected for the employee to meet in carrying out his burden of proof.

When the employer has kept proper and accurate records, the employee may easily discharge his burden by securing the production of those records. But where the employer's records are inaccurate or inadequate, and the employee cannot offer convincing substitutes, a more difficult problem arises. The solution, however, is not to penalize the employee by denying him any recovery on the ground that he is unable to prove the precise extent of uncompensated work. Such a result would place a premium on an employer's failure to keep proper records in conformity with his statutory duty; it would allow the employer to keep the benefits of an employee's labors without paying due compensation as contemplated by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The Court further said:

In such a situation we hold that an employee has carried out his burden if he proves that he has, in fact, performed work for which he was improperly compensated and if he produces sufficient evidence to show the amount and extent of that work as a matter of just and reasonable inference. The burden then shifts to the employer to come forward with evidence of the precise amount of work performed or with evidence to negative the reasonableness of the inference to be drawn from the employee's evidence. If the employer fails to produce such evidence, the court may then award damages to the employee, even though the result be only approximate.

Citing a note in Forty-third Columbia Law Review, page 355.

Mr. President, it will be observed, in connection with the quotations which I have read with respect to the burden of proof, that they are in the very same decision in which is rendered the holding that there is liability for walking, as I have indicated, regardless of contrary custom or contract; and the court does not mention the fact that under a situation in which neither custom nor contract existed to compensate for the walking done by individuals, it is hardly likely that employers would be keeping records of the intricate mathematics involved in marking down the exact walking time and walking periods of each of the employees as to whom neither custom nor contract had entitled the employee to specific compensation.

I say specific compensation for the reason, as will appear later on, that it is the view of well-informed individuals that there is compensation granted to every employee in the performance of his duties, if in computing the hourly figure or the price per piece of his product, the fact that he did the walking or did the preliminary activities had been taken into account, and that in order that he should be so compensated it is not necessary that, in addition to his hourly pay or his price per piece of work performed, he should receive separate amounts computed on the basis of the number of minutes involved in walking from the door to his machine or in taping his arms or in any of the other activities to which I have referred.

Mr. President, the case of Mount Clemens Pottery Co. was, as I have indicated, decided on June 10, 1946. In connection with it, a rehearing was denied on October 14, 1946. I omitted to mention something of particular importance and interest, and perhaps I should say of particular interest to the Members of this body. That arose from the fact that there was not a unanimous decision in the case of Anderson against Mount Clemens Pottery Co. The decision was handed down by His Honor, Mr. Justice Murphy. Mr. Justice Jackson took no part in the reconsideration or decision of the case. The majority of the Court concurred in the view taken by Mr. Justice Murphy, but two of the members of the Court dissented. One of them was Mr. Justice Frankfurter; the other was Mr. Justice Burton, with whom many of us in this body have had the privilege and pleasure of serving as Members of the United States Senate.

So, Mr. President, I have recited in some detail the situation in regard to the Mount Clemens case.

In view of the announcement by the Court that regardless of custom or contract, compensation should be paid for the activities to which I have referred, it is not strange that the Nation should greet that decision, when its full import was realized, with the utmost of surprise. I undertake to say, Mr. President, that it is reasonable to conclude from the evidence before our subcommittee that the surprise was not limited to employers, but that it was shared by the employees. I think the very fact that suits were filed in such great numbers, not before, but subsequent to the decision of the Mount Clemens case, indicates very clearly the fact that the activities for which the Court was awarding compensation were such as had not been deemed by either management or employees to be compensable as such.

Mr. President, I do not rely solely upon my own opinion or that of the other members of our committee. We had before us numerous witnesses. Among them was a gentleman serving with the United States Government, Brig. Gen. Maurice Hirsch, of the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board, the duties of which are at least in a general way familiar, I have no doubt, to the Members of this body. Obviously General Hirsch had had a most interesting and important official position with the United States Government. The vastness of his experience is indicated when we realize that he came in frequent contact with contractors and subcontractors generally, as indicated by the following excerpt from his testimony, appearing at page 434 of the printed hearings:

General HIRSCH. I think it would be of interest to the committee to know that we have reviewed, out of a total of 117,937 assignments covering the fiscal years from 1942 through 1946, inclusive, we have completed 113,284 assignments, or 96.1 percent.

He further pointed out that—

The gross renegotiation recoveries of all the departments conducting renegotiation have amounted to up to and inclusive of 31 December 1946, $10,086,058,000. And, incidentally, all of my figures are as of that date.

Mr. President, he estimated that—

Taxes would have recovered, even apart from renegotiation, approximately 70 percent of the amount, leaving an estimated net recovery in renegotiation of $3,025,817,000.

I cite these figures, not with the expectation that they will be remembered, but with the design of indicating the vastness of the opportunity of General Hirsch to observe whether the action of the Court in the Mount Clemens case as to the right of the employees to receive compensation for previously-uncompensated activities, so far as specific compensation is concerned, was or was not surprising.

In that connection, I now read to the Senate an excerpt from the testimony of General Hirsch, appearing at page 751 of the hearings. Speaking of something that had gone before, he said:

I do not offer that as a basis of suggestion that there should be relief granted to him. I offer it only as a basis of most careful consideration which I know the Congress and this committee particularly have given as to whether or not these are proper claims when labor thought it was being adequately and completely compensated for what it was doing during the period of the war.

If it was completely compensated during the war then our thinking would be that then perhaps extra dollars that it was not expecting to get may be excessive payments.

Then the question was asked him:

Do you, or do you not, think that these dollars sought in these portal-to-portal suits were dollars which they did not expect to get?

General Hirsch responded:

Of course, I cannot answer for labor, but from everything I can gather—

I digress again to point out that the general had been a party to the renegotiation of vast numbers of contracts. He said:

From everything I can gather, it seems to me they are looking at it as something of a windfall.

Then the question was asked him:

The industry did not expect anything of that sort?

General Hirsch responded:

No, sir. Certainly, if they had expected it, they would have given it to us in renegotiation.

It has never been presented to us as far as I know.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. If I understand the Senator correctly, the pont is made by General Hirsch, in all these claims for some $10,000,000,000 which were renegotiated and recovered for the Government, that neither labor nor management ever raised the question that is presented in the Mount Clemens case.

Mr. DONNELL. My understanding is that General Hirsch means that the contention that labor was entitled to compensation as such for activities such as set forth in the Mount Clemens case was not made before the renegotiation authorities in Washington in any of this vast number of cases.

Mr. LUCAS. No one who was interested in litigation of this kind, whether management or labor, ever raised the question at any time during the renegotiation of war contracts?

Mr. DONNELL. That is my understanding.

Mr. LUCAS. I think that is very important.

Mr. DONNELL. I wish to call attention to the fact, however, that General Hirsch said, as I have indicated:

Of course, I cannot answer for labor, but from everything I can gather it seems to me they are looking at it as something of a windfall.

Then the question was asked:

The industry did not expect anything of that sort?

General Hirsch answered:

No, sir. Certainly, if they had expected it, they would have given it to us in renegotiation.

It has never been presented to us as far as I know.

In answer further to the Senator from Illinois, I may state that I think if, in the course of these renegotiation proceedings involving vast amounts and numbers, none of the employers made claim with the Government that they contemplated being made liable for portal-to-portal pay, it is a clear inference, justified from that fact, that no demands had ever been made upon the employers by labor for those amounts, or the employers would certainly have called the attention of the Government authorities in renegotiation matters to the fact.

I want to make it perfectly clear that in renegotiation matters the employers were in this situation: The Government was undertaking to determine, not only as to particular, isolated contracts, but in the aggregate of the activities of a particular contractor, whether he was making more than a fair amount of money on his war dealings with the Government. The Government was taking the position, and enforcing it, that if the contractor was making more than a fair profit, the contractor would have to pay back to the Government in cash the amount that had been paid to him in excess of a reasonable profit.

Obviously, if any labor union, any appreciable number of employees, yes, I would undertake to say, any individual employee whose judgment was regarded as of any consequence, had made demand upon any employers for compensation for portal-to-portal activities, certainly as a matter of protection, as a matter of preventing having to pay the Government hard cash in the renegotiation proceedings, the employers would have called those facts to the attention of the Government. I thank the Senator for his inquiry.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. Is it not true that the distinguished Senator, in investigating this situation, had occasion to consult with a number of the representatives of labor, distinguished labor counsel, and others?

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

Mr. WILEY. My question is, did any of those gentlemen ever suggest that during the period prior to the Mount Clemens case, labor at any time made a claim that they had the right which is now claimed?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, there is a very interesting answer to be made to the Senator. It is found particularly in the testimony of Mr. Lee Pressman, counsel for the United States Steelworkers, CIO, and while not having appeared in that capacity, he is also counsel for the Congress of Industrial Organizations. I think I am fairly summarizing his testimony when I say he takes the position that over a period of years labor had been working in the effort to place itself in the position where it could claim the right to specific compensation for activities not previously claimed to be compensable. He took the position that there had been a series of developments in the interpretative rulings of the Wage and Hour Administrator. He took the position that in the Tennessee Coal & Iron case, and in the Jewell Ridge case, a sort of a red flag had been waved in the face of industry, not to anger it or antagonize it, but to warn it of the fact that there might be further activities on the part of employees.

So the argument that is made on behalf of labor, at least in part, is to the general effect, as one man put it—I do not think this is in the evidence, but I observed it in the press—that capital, management, had been gambling with the situation, that it was seeking its progressive development in the decisions of the departments and of the courts, which should have placed management on its guard.

Mr. President, in further answer to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, let me say that I do not think there is one line in the testimony to show that any employee, of all the 20,000,000 who are covered under the Fair Labor Standards Act, had filed any suit other than the Mount Clemens case, prior to the rendition of the decision in that case, to assert his right to pay for these so-called portal-to-portal activities. I should add, however, that in the Tennessee Coal & Iron case and the Jewell Ridge case, the proceedings were instituted, not, as I recall it, by labor, but by management itself, in order to secure declaratory judgments setting forth the respective obligations of management. So, Mr. President, I think it fair to say that labor itself has not, by its activities, or its suits, or its utterances, so far as they are shown in the evidence, prior to the Mount Clemens case, indicated to management even remotely that they were expecting to come forward and lay claim to these vast amounts, aggregating $5,750,000,000.

I want to quote, however, in fairness to labor in this matter, this excerpt from the United Automobile Worker, CIO, January 194[illegible]. It says:

UNION SUES BIG THREE FOR BACK PAY

The UAW-CIO filed portal-to-portal pay suits in the Federal district court in Detroit January 2 against the General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co., and Chrysler Corp.—

I pause in the reading to interpolate that, of course, this was several months after the ruling on the motion for rehearing in the Mount Clemens case. I proceed with the quotation—on behalf of workers in the Michigan plants of those companies. Suits were filed at the same time on behalf of employees in Michigan plants of a number of other companies.

On the same afternoon other suits were filed throughout the country by UAW-CIO attorneys in cases involving plants outside of Michigan.

As the suits were filed, the union issued the following statement:

"The suits filed by the UAW-CIO today cover many more factors than just the one of so-called portal-to-portal pay, or walking time, which was ruled upon by the Supreme Court in the Mount Clemens Pottery case.

"Actually in some cases, the factor of walking time does not even appear. In other cases, other factors are far greater, and the walking-time issue is subordinate to them.

"NUMEROUS DECISIONS

"In the last 6 years there have been numerous decisions and rulings covering these other factors, long before the decision in the Mount Clemens Pottery case."

I continue the quotation:

Employers who now complain that the interpretation of the law on which the suits are based has been sprung upon them belatedly are simply not telling the truth. Over a period of years they have simply failed to pay their workers for time which they should have been paid in the hope that the workers would not discover their rights and demand payment.

The sums which these workers are now suing to recover should have been included in their pay envelopes during these last 6 years, but they have been cheated out of them.

The quotation which I have read is taken from the United Automobile Workers, official publication of the international union of United Automobile, Aircraft, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, affiliated with the CIO.

Mr. WILEY. What is the date?

Mr. DONNELL. The date of it is January 1947, volume 10, No. 11.

Mr. President, I think it is perfectly obvious from the testimony before us that notwithstanding statements of the type which I have given—I have tried to give them as fairly as I could; if there is any omission, if any Member of the Senate will call it to my attention, I shall be glad to give it as fully as time will permit. I say that it is my judgment that there had been no suit filed, nothing on behalf of industrial workers to indicate the intention or the thought that they had a right to sue for vast amounts such as are involved in this flood of litigation, until after the decision in the Mount Clemens case.

In this connection I think it of some importance to call attention to the testimony of a very distinguished witness who appeared before us, Mr. William C. Foster, who is the Under Secretary of the Department of Commerce. I am not quoting, for the moment, Mr. Foster's own expression of opinion. I am quoting from the statement which was incorporated in the record, which he brought with him; a statement made by the Business Advisory Council for the Department of Commerce. He calls attention to the fact that the active members of the Business Advisory Council total 60; and, says Mr. Foster:

That group represents both small and large industry, and comes from geographically the entire Nation.

He says further:

There are graduated members, consisting of some of the active past members of that council. It represents a very broad segment of the American industry.

I should like to quote a very few words from this statement of the subcommittee, of the Business Advisory Council of the Department of Commerce of the United States, composed of gentlemen who are listed in extenso in this report, several pages of the report being required to do it. Here is the way the statement, dated January 20, 1947, starts:

Industrial managers for the most part have been taken by surprise and are bewildered by the stupendous suits which have been instituted against large and small companies. Following the decision in the Jewell Ridge case, business insofar as it gave thought to the matter felt that pay for travel time applied only to mining.

I pause for a moment at that point, Mr. President, to suggest that a reading of those two cases, in very dramatic and powerful and eloquent exposition by the court of the conditions in the mining quarters underneath the ground, of the type to which I have referred, I think would lead one inevitably to the conclusion that the court was moved in extremely large part by the conditions which were prevailing in that particular industry; and so I take it that it is not strange, nor unwise, nor improper that industry should have—to quote again from this statement of the subcommittee of the Business Advisory Council—

Following the decision in the Jewell Ridge case, business insofar as it gave thought to the matter felt that pay for travel time applied only to mining.

Then, Mr. President, the statement continues:

The Mount Clemens Pottery case aroused only moderate interest, and since a request for reconsideration was pending, it was only in October 1946 that denial of reconsideration focused the industrial mind on the potential liabilities involved.

I might read other statements from the testimony, but I take it that it is unnecessary to emphasize in this body the fact that every Member of the Senate must know that the filing of this great number of suits came as a surprise both to labor and to management, and to the public itself.

Mr. President, how did this influx of litigation occur?

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HAWKES. I do not know what the Senator had before his committee, but I am wondering if he knows that there are many labor organizations in the United States, some affiliated with the two national unions, whose members have had put up to them the proposition of filing a suit for recovery of portal-to-portal charges or fees, and the men have absolutely refused to do it. In one case I happen to know of, not more than 12 percent of the men would agree to the filing of suit, because the men themselves told the labor leaders who wanted them to file suit that it would be unfair, that they never understood they had such pay coming to them and they would not be involved in such plan. I wonder if the Senator knows that.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I am willing to take the assurance of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, because of his adequate knowledge. When he tells the Senate that is a fact, it is a fact.

I cannot say, Mr. President, that I know of the specific illustration to which the Senator referred, but, in my opinion, when neither labor nor management had expected these activities to be compensated, other than in the hourly rate or the piecework rate for which the employees worked, it is not at all surprising that numbers of employees should have taken the very conscientious attitude to which the Senator from New Jersey refers.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment more?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. My reason for adverting to the matter at this point in the Senator's presentation of this very important subject is that I think it is a great tribute to the American workers. I do not believe the patriotic working men and women of the United States want to indulge in a process of extracting something merely because they think they have the power to do it. I think they are fair; I think they are honorable; and, in my opinion, the fact I have just cited is a great tribute to the working people who have taken that position.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator for his interpolation into the RECORD at this time.

Mr. President, I was about to go into the question briefly as to how this influx of litigation occurred. What was the mechanics of it? How did it develop? I undertake to say, as the report shows at pages 12 and following, that the evidence demonstrates conclusively the existence of a very close connection between many of the suits and certain CIO affiliates. Some of the CIO affiliates, between which, in some of the suits, evidence demonstrates a very close connection, are the United Steelworkers of America, the Textile Union of America, the United Automobile Workers of America, and United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America.

Evidence also demonstrates conclusively the existence, as our report points out, of a very close connection between certain of the suits and Mr. Lee Pressman, general counsel of the United Steelworkers of America, Mr. Philip Murray, and Mr. David J. McDonald, president and secretary-treasurer of the United Steelworkers of America, Mr. Russ Nixon, Washington representative of the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America (UE-CIO), and Mr. Irving Richter, legislative representative of the United Automobile Workers of America, and some local officers of CIO affiliates.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time to go into the details before the Senate as to the facts set forth at pages 12 and following of our report as to the connection which the CIO affiliates to which I have referred had with the institution of these suits. I call attention only to a very few outstanding and salient facts.

It will be observed on page 13 of our report that there is therein set forth a booklet entitled "Instructions on Procedure in Travel-Time Cases," dated November 1, 1946, issued by International Union, United Steelworkers of America, signed by United Steelworkers of America, Philip Murray, president, David J. McDonald, secretary-treasurer. This booklet proceeds to advise the gentlemen to whom it is sent that it contains the following:

DETAILED INSTRUCTIONS ON PROCEDURE FOR YOUR USE IN CONNECTION WITH TRAVEL-TIME CASES; THAT IS, PORTAL-TO-PORTAL OR GATE-TO-GATE PAY LEGAL PROBLEMS

It contains:

1. A general memorandum prepared by General Counsel Lee Pressman dealing with the problems which are raised in connection with preparing lawsuits.

2. An analysis of the Supreme Court case dealing with this issue and indicating how the case is applicable to the steel, aluminum, and fabricating industries.

3. Suggestions to district directors for guidance in making arrangements with local attorneys.

4. Bill of complaint.

Then the following:

We have printed the following documents, which are being sent to you in quantity. Additional copies may be obtained through my office from time to time as they are needed by you:

1. Authorization to prosecute wage-and-hour claims—Form No. TC–1.

2. Questionnaire on overtime pay—Form No. TC–2.

We are sending you a small supply of the following:

3. Power of attorney—Form No. TC–3.

Sincerely yours,

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA,
PHILIP MURRAY, President.
DAVID J. MCDONALD,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. President, it would be tedious, and unnecessary because the Senate can read it, to read all the portions of the general memorandum prepared by Mr. Pressman, which are set forth in this report. I call attention to the opening sentence and possibly to one or two others. He says this:

TRAVEL-TIME PAY RIGHTS UNDER WAGE-HOUR LAW

At the last executive board meeting, the recent decision of the Supreme Court—

I pause at this point to point out the fact that no mention is there made of the progressive development in the interpretative rulings of the departments; no mention is therein made of the Tennessee Coal & Iron case or of the Jewell Ridge case. The only mention made is, as I have read, to—the recent decision of the Supreme Court applying the travel-time principle under the wage-hour law to—

to manufacturing and industrial plants was discussed.

I digress again, Mr. President, to suggest the fact that there the writer of that memorandum recognized that in the Mount Clemens case there is a vast extension of the doctrine which was set forth in the Jewell Ridge and the Tennessee Coal & Iron cases, an extension taking the doctrine out of the bowels of the earth and applying it to manufacturing and industrial plants of the fine, up-to-date type of which the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. is an example.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I wonder if the Senator interprets that booklet giving instructions on litigation as being a stimulus or an urge or an attempt on the part of Mr. Pressman to have lawsuits commenced in various jurisdictions throughout the United States.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I want to set forth, if I can, as fairly as possible to Mr. Pressman, the impressions which I obtained. Mr. Pressman's testimony was lengthy. If the Senator from Iowa will permit let me give him somewhat in extenso something of the background he will understand my answer much more clearly than by my saying "Yes" or "No." Mr. Pressman came before our committee. One full day was set aside for the testimony of the CIO witnesses. Mr. Pressman, himself, as many of the Members of the Senate know, is an extremely capable lawyer, a gentleman of fine ability. Mr. Pressman testified extensively, and filed with the committee a very interesting and important summary of the position taken by his group of workers. Mr. Pressman, generally speaking, took the position, I think I am correct in saying, that he was not undertaking to encourage the litigation. He charged that the American Federation of Labor in the Dow Chemical case had brought about a settlement under which the employees had secured, as I recall, a settlement in excess of $4,000,000, and that the CIO were confronted by the competitive situation arising by one labor union, the American Federation of Labor, benefiting its members by securing a large settlement, and that therefore the CIO were confronted with the problem of what they should do, and they finally determined that they should make known to their members the situation, and give to them the requisite backgrounds upon which they might act in order to file these cases as they might deem proper.

So, Mr. President, I think Mr. Pressman, were he here this afternoon, would say very vigorously that he did not encourage the filing of these suits. But, human nature being what it is, with the language in this memorandum as it is, with the suggestions contained therein as they are—and I am going to read the memorandum a little more fully in view of the question asked by the Senator from Iowa—in view of those things, and in view of some other things I intend to read, I undertake to say that the necessary impact upon the mind of employees desiring to secure something, even though they had not expected to secure it, must have been to inspire the thought that here was the opportunity before them to enrich themselves by an unexpected windfall, and that the better part of wisdom would require them to take advantage of the opportunity.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one more observation?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Of course, I was merely inquiring as to whether the age-old concept that a lawyer should not attempt to stir up lawsuits because that is not considered to be ethical was involved. I am wondering whether the Senator thinks that this might be somewhat comparable to the agitating saboteur who says to persons in an industrial plant, "I advise you not to put ground glass in the gears because that is against the law, and you must not do it, as it would stop the machinery and stop this plant."

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I may best answer the Senator by stating that in the pending bill there is an express reference to the fact that the results of such suits as these, if they be permitted to be maintained—and, I may interpolate, the results of their maintenance in such great numbers arising from such wholesale circularizations as were made by Mr. Pressman, Mr. Philip Murray, and others, and such actions as were taken by Mr. Al Whitehouse, regional director of the United Steelworkers of America for district No. 25, to which actions I shall refer in a moment—I say that in the pending bill there is an express statement that among the results is "the stirring up of champertous practices and congestion of courts."

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. When the National Association of Manufacturers advises its members that the Supreme Court has made certain rulings which entitle them to certain rights, is the Senator prepared to say that the United States Chamber of Commerce or the National Association of Manufacturers is engaging in champertous practices because it advises its members of rights which the Supreme Court of the United States has declared to exist?

It seems to me that we are complaining that a labor organization saw fit to advise its affiliated members over the United States of a certain opinion of the Supreme Court which might be of interest to them and which might hold for their members certain rights. I ask the Senator whether or not he thinks there is anything very wrong or vicious about that kind of practice?

Mr. DONNELL. The answer is that I do not think there is anything wrong or vicious in advising members as to what the holdings of the Supreme Court of the United States are. I think the greater publicity that can be given to such holdings, through organizations or otherwise, the better conditions will be. But there is a very material difference between sending out a notification to members as to what is the decision in a particular case, and the action which was taken in the cases which I have cited, in which, in addition to the information, a booklet was sent, with the statement:

This booklet contains detailed instructions on procedure for your use in connection with travel-time cases.

There is also an analysis, and suggestions for guidance in making arrangements with local attorneys; a bill of complaint and authorization to prosecute the claims, as well as a questionnaire with respect to overtime pay and power of attorney.

The answer is that I think there is a point at which the dissemination of knowledge, if followed by such actions as these, tends not to the mere justifiable dissemination of knowledge, but to the stirring up of champerty and improper practice in the courts of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I do not wish to go into the ethics of lawyers, and I do not desire to defend anything that anyone has done, but I am wondering, if we condemn what was done by the attorney for the CIO, if we can condemn what was done by certain organizations which, instead of urging that a test case be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States to determine the constitutionality of a certain law, urged members of the organization to bring suits in every district court of the United States and thereby force the agency to answer each one of those cases. The Senator cannot defend such a practice, can he?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I do not know enough of the circumstances surrounding the cases to which the Senator refers to answer the question. I will say that regardless of whether it involves an employee or an employer, any action which would leave an implication of the solicitation of business in the courts, and which leads to encouragement of vast numbers of suits on a series of facts such as those named, whether it is done by labor or by management, in my judgment it is improper and cannot be properly defended.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to hear the Senator make that statement.

Mr. DONNELL. It is very easy for a person to stand here, as a certain Senator said the other day outside this Chamber, and undertake to pick the mote out of someone else's eye when there may be a beam in his own. Mr. Pressman is entitled to have his testimony fairly considered. I have tried to do so. There may be something that I have overlooked. It is very extensive testimony. Mr. Pressman was very cooperative in trying to give to the committee supplementary information. There was one instance in which he refused at the moment to give certain information to the committee, but on reconsideration he did give it.

I am not here as a prosecutor of Mr. Pressman or the CIO. I am simply presenting the facts as to how this litigation began. Each of us can draw his own conclusion.

I was reading from the general memorandum. It is addressed to the district officers, staff representatives, and local unions of the United Steelworkers of America. Mr. Pressman says:

I have been requested by the executive board to advise you as to the rights of the employees in the steel industry to travel-time pay and to make all arrangements necessary for the commencement of the lawsuits which are authorized by the employees in the industry. This memorandum is intended to give you the information which you need to start acting immediately on the program decided on by the executive board.

That is the language of the memorandum. I continue:

THE PROGRAM OF ACTION ADOPTED BY THE EXECUTIVE BOARD

The executive board decided that there were certain cases which would be handled through the national office and others which would be handled by each district director for the plants in his own district. The division is as follows:

(a) Cases to be handled by the national office:

The wage-hour claims in connection with all plants of the five major subsidiaries of the United States Steel Corp. (American Steel & Wire, National Tube, Carnegie-Illinois, Tennessee Coal & Iron, Columbia Steel), Republic Steel Corp., Bethlehem Steel Co., and the Aluminum Co. of America will be handled through the national office.

(b) Cases to be handled by the district directors:

For all other plants where legal action is to be taken, the district director will make his own arrangements.

I omit some of the wording, although it is equally illuminating. It deals with the steps to be taken in the cases which are to be handled through the national office.

Where the cases are to be handled through the national office it will be necessary to secure from each worker appropriate authorization to bring the suit on his behalf—

To secure it—not to give him the opportunity to give it, but to secure it from him. Continuing the quotation—and also appropriate information to help in preparing the legal papers. For this purpose, arrangements should be made for each worker in the plants of the United States Steel subsidiaries named above, Republic Steel and Bethlehem Steel, to do the following immediately:

(a) Sign an authorization in the form of TC–1. You will notice that it will be necessary in these forms to fill in your own name as district director and the names of the president and recording secretary (or such other local union official as you think would be appropriate) of the local to which the worker belongs.

(b) Fill out at the same time a questionnaire showing the facts on which his claim will be based. Form TC–2 is the questionnaire. If the answers to these questions are the same for an entire department, it may be possible for a grievance committeeman or a staff man to fill out the "Information on Working Time," from page 2 to the end, of a single questionnaire for a whole department, and attach to it a number of copies of page 1 of the questionnaire, one for each worker to whom the answers apply. If this procedure is followed, the man filling out the master questionnaire should be careful to give individual names of workers who have instances to give under such questions as 11, 12, 15, 25, 26, and 27.

Arrangements should be made to have these authorizations and questionnaires in these national cases forwarded to the district director and kept by him until further instructions are received from the national office. These files should be arranged by plants.

My office will make the necessary arrangements with the local attorneys whom we will use in these national cases. It is anticipated that there will be one lawsuit for each of the companies to be handled as national cases.

We can all draw our own conclusions from this language. The memorandum proceeds with respect to steps to be taken in cases which are to be handled locally.

In the case of all plants other than those named above, any legal action will be handled directly by the district director and the local attorney whom he selects.

The national legal department will be available at all times for advice and guidance on cases being handled locally.

All local attorneys should be requested to send to us copies of complaints and briefs when filed and, as far as possible, to keep us informed of developments in their cases. Whenever you retain a local attorney, please let my office know his name, the cases he is to handle, and the arrangement for fees which you have made with him. It is important for the local attorney to get in touch with my office in order to obtain our analysis of the legal issues.

Mr. President, how was this interpreted by the district directors? I hold in my hand a document to which I have referred, signed by Al Whitehouse, director, district 25, United Steel Workers of America, dated December 21, 1946, from which I should like to read.

In black type at the top of the page there are printed the words:

ACTION NOW WILL SAVE YOUR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL BACK PAY — PROTECT YOUR POCKETBOOK AGAINST PLOT TO SCUTTLE WAGES AND HOURS ACT

Private advices from Washington, received in Middletown Wednesday—

That is Middletown, Ohio—

disclose the startling information that a move is afoot to scuttle the Wages and Hours Act immediately after Congress convenes on January 3, and if possible, to destroy the right of wage earners to collect back pay for portal-to-portal time, recently awarded for the fourth time by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Of course, it is possible that the plotters cannot muster enough votes to enact such diabolical legislation. And such legislation may be unconstitutional. It is also possible that Congress may not go the entire distance. But what Armco employee would risk that? It is now certain that a strong group of bipartisan reactionaries is determined to go the limit in undermining the Wages and Hours Act.

Under the circumstances, every steel worker employed at Armco should act before Congress acts. Otherwise he may lose all of his back pay for portal-to-portal time, except the pitiful part a hostile Congressman and a predatory corporation would give him willingly.

Then there is a heading in smaller black type, "USA-CIO leads portal-to-portal fight."

The memorandum continues:

The steel workers' union carried the first cases on portal-to-portal pay to the Supreme Court and won. The Court awarded back pay for portal-to-portal time. The decisions of the Court on that point are now well established.

The law provides that an employee must be paid time and a half for all hours in excess of the workweek fixed in the wage-and-hour law. The act established the workweek for the year, October 1938 to October 1939, at 44 hours. For the next year—that is, from October 1939 to October 1940, the workweek established was 42 hours. For all years subsequent to October 1940, the workweek is set at 40 hours.

The Supreme Court held that all time spent on company property going to and from work, changing clothes, preparing for the job, getting tools ready, and other make-ready activities prior to the actual commencement of productive work, and after work, is "time worked" under the Wages and Hours Act.

However, during the years covered by the act, virtually every employee in the steel industry worked the full workweek at productive work. Consequently, the make-ready work and the travel time must now be accounted for as hours worked in excess of the lawful workweek, and therefore must be paid for at the rate of time and one-half.

Moreover, under the Wage and Hour Act, the employees are entitled to not only their unpaid wages at the rate of time and one-half, but also to an equal amount as liquidated damages.

Further headlines are "How to figure portal-to-portal pay" and "USA-CIO says Armco must pay."

Under the latter heading is the following:

The steel workers' union is determined to protect the right of every Armco steel worker to recover every cent due him under the Wages and Hours Act. And since it isn't feasible for each steel worker to sue Armco individually, District Director Al Whitehouse has arranged to sue in behalf of all steelworker claimants employed by Armco.

And so forth.

Mr. President, I ask leave to have incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the entire circular from which I have read.

There being no objection, the circular was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACTION NOW WILL SAVE YOUR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL BACK PAY—PROTECT YOUR POCKETBOOK AGAINST PLOT TO SCUTTLE WAGES AND HOURS ACT

Private advices from Washington, received in Middletown Wednesday, disclose the startling information that a move is afoot to scuttle the Wages and Hours Act immediately after Congress convenes on January 3, and, if possible, to destroy the right of wage earners to collect back pay for portal-to-portal time, recently awarded for the fourth time by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Of course, it is possible that the plotters cannot muster enough votes to enact such diabolical legislation. And such legislation may be unconstitutional. It is also possible that Congress may not go the entire distance. But what Armco employee would risk that? It is now certain that a strong group of bipartisan reactionaries is determined to go the limit in undermining the Wages and Hours Act.

Under the circumstances, every steel worker employed at Armco should act before Congress acts. Otherwise he may lose all of his back pay for portal-to-portal time, except the pitiful part a hostile Congressman and a predatory corporation would give him willingly.

USA-CIO LEADS PORTAL-TO-PORTAL FIGHT

The steel workers' union carried the first cases on portal-to-portal pay to the Supreme Court and won. The Court awarded back pay for portal-to-portal time. The decisions of the Court on that point are now well established.

The law provides that an employee must be paid time and a half for all hours in excess of the workweek fixed in the wage-and-hour law. The act established the workweek for the year, October 1938 to October 1939 at 44 hours. For the next year—that is from October 1939 to October 1940, the workweek established was 42 hours. For all years subsequent to October 1940 the workweek is set at 40 hours.

The Supreme Court held that all time spent on company property going to and from work, changing clothes, preparing for the job, getting tools ready, and other make-ready activities prior to the actual commencement of productive work, and after work, is time worked under the Wages and Hours Act.

However, during the years covered by the act, virtually every employee in the steel industry worked the full workweek at productive work. Consequently the make-ready work and the travel time must now be accounted for as hours worked in excess of the lawful workweek and therefore must be paid for at the rate of time and one-half.

Moreover, under the Wages and Hours Act, the employees are entitled to not only their unpaid wages at the rate of time and one-half, but also to an equal amount as liquidated damages.

HOW TO FIGURE PORTAL-TO-PORTAL PAY

To illustrate: If an Armco employee, who is paid at the rate of $1 an hour, required 30 minutes each morning for travel time on the company's property, and other make-ready activities preparing for productive work, and the same amount each evening after the end of his 8 hours of productive work, that Armco employee would be entitled to back pay for portal-to-portal time for an hour a day at time and one-half, or $1.50. But, since he would be entitled to an equal amount as liquidated damages, the American Rolling Mill Co. would owe him $3 back pay for portal-to-portal time for that day.

Thus, if the employee averaged an hour of portal-to-portal time each day for 30 days, at $1 an hour, the company would owe him $90. If he had an hour a day in portal-to-portal time due him for 1,000 days, he would have a claim against Armco for $3,000.

USA-CIO SAYS ARMCO MUST PAY

The steel workers' union is determined to protect the right of every Armco steelworker to recover every cent due him under the Wage and Hour Act. And since it isn't feasible for each steel worker to sue Armco individually. District Director Al Whitehouse has arranged to sue in behalf of all steelworker claimants employed by Armco.

The action must be filed in court before Congress enacts destructive legislation on the subject. And attorneys must have time to prepare the case. So the safety deadline is December 31, or as much earlier as each Armco steel worker can execute his authorization. No Armco steel worker incurs a financial obligation when he signs the authorization. The authorization itself discloses how legal expenses are to be paid.

Until Wednesday of this week, it was assumed that ample time was available for obtaining the authorizations. However, with the discovery of a plot in Washington to destroy the Wages and Hours Act, it became apparent at once that there is no time to lose.

Therefore all steel workers employed by Armco are urged to get their authorizations filled out and in the steel workers' office at 1836 Central Avenue, Middletown, Ohio, as quickly as possible. If any questions arise, or if any point is not understood, please get in touch with a staff representative, or with the Middletown office.

AL WHITEHOUSE,
Director, District 25, United Steelworkers of America.
DECEMBER 21, 1946.

BULLETIN

If you have already signed an authorization for suit to be filed for recovery of back pay for the portal-to-portal time you have earned since 1938, and if that authorization is in the steelworkers' office, your rights will be fully protected.

If you have not signed such an authorization you should do so at once, and make sure it is delivered to the steel workers' office. If you delay beyond December 31 you may be too late. Congress may shut off your right to back pay for portal-to-portal time when it convenes. Congress has no power to deprive you of your back pay if you act before Congress meets and acts.

If you have already executed your authorization and filed it in the steelworkers' office you should help your fellow members to complete theirs as quickly as possible. The more steel workers who authorize suits the stronger the case. All authorizations should be in the steelworkers' office as soon as possible; none later than December 31. Steel workers who delay too long may find their claims are outlawed.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, it is not strange, in view of the facts to which I have referred, that the exhibit furnished to the committee by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], appearing at pages 22, and following, of the report, shows that the great majority of cases, in the column headed "Union," bear the designation "CIO," with the name of the particular affiliate, such as United Steelworkers of America.

The first CIO affiliate on the list is the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, which has brought a suit for $25,000,000 against the American Smelting & Refining Co. An inspection of those two and one-half pages will disclose the fact that almost all the cases were brought in close association with a CIO affiliate, regardless of the technical arrangement.

Mr. President, I referred a little while ago to the American Federation of Labor. I am not here as an advocate of either of these labor organizations. I called attention to the fact that Mr. Pressman charged that the reason the CIO became so active was, at least in part, due to the activity of the American Federation of Labor. I call attention to the fact that on page 19 of the report there is a statement by Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, which refers to the wide publicity which "has been given to court actions filed by certain labor unions in an attempt to recover back pay for their members for travel time and other time spent on employer's property, such as changing clothes and preparing for work, claiming this to be time worked within the meaning of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938."

Mr. Green further says:

Very few of these suits have been brought by unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. It is the long-established policy of the American Federation of Labor to rely upon collective bargaining through direct negotiations between unions and employers to settle differences between them regarding wages, hours, and working conditions of the workers concerned. * * * Appeal to authority before all the voluntary means of resolving differences have been exhausted, invites invasion of the right of labor and management to contract about their affairs. Such untimely and unwarranted resort to administrative or judicial intervention is inconsistent with the mutual rights and responsibilities established by employers and unions through private contract in a free society.

All national and international unions affiliated with the metal trades department of the A. F. of L. and a number of other A. F. of L. affiliates have officially declared it to be their policy to make the definition of time worked, within the meaning of the Fair Labor Standards Act or otherwise, subject to collective bargaining negotiation in preference to litigation.

There is also set forth in the report a statement made by Mr. John P. Frey, president of the metal trades department, an AFL affiliate, in which he says:

To now inject the question of back pay, for portal-to-portal time, would be an admission that when wage agreements were signed by trade-union representatives, they had been insincere during the negotiations, and had held mental reservations which they were unwilling to discuss with employers while seated at the conference table.

Our trade-union movement has no assets more valuable than its agreements with employers, and the integrity which is involved.

There is nothing to prevent the discussion of portal-to-portal pay when existing agreements with employers are negotiated, and the inclusion of this form of payment in the new agreements. But as to existing agreements with employers, many of them entered into with the same corporation for a generation or more, the executive council definitely recommends that existing collective-bargaining agreements must not be dishonored by now entering into legal suits to secure a form of wages which were not provided for when the existing agreements were negotiated.

Mr. President, thus it is that this influx of litigation began. The query arises at once, What is the effect of this portal-to-portal litigation? Is there any reason, from the standpoint of public policy, why the cases should be annulled and canceled, or should they be permitted to take their regular course in the courts?

Our report undertakes to point out in greater detail than I shall attempt to go the effect of portal-to-portal pay actions. I shall somewhat briefly summarize the main points of the report upon that subject.

First, the effect upon the companies which are sued. Obviously, the very fact of the institution of the suits, insofar as the suits are large in proportion to the capital assets of the corporation, company, or individual, as the case may be, has a very strong tendency to result in impairment of the financial position of the defendants. During the course of our hearings it was brought out that some of the pending suits brought by employees for portal-to-portal pay ask for amounts so large that in some instances they exceed the working capital itself of the firms which are being sued, and in other instances they exceed the net worth of the firms being sued.

A while ago mention was made of the Armco company, the American Rolling Mill Co. Mr. Hook, its president, testified that in the steel industry, pending portal-to-portal suits at the time of his testimony totaled an estimated $1,000,000,000; and he said that:

This is a considerably larger amount than the amount of cash which the entire industry has on hand and in banks. At the end of 1945 the cash position of the combined industry was less than $700,000,000. One billion dollars is a larger amount than the entire net earnings of all companies in the steel industry for the 5 years 1942 to 1946, inclusive.

Among the very interesting witnesses before the committee was Mr. Howard I. Young, president of the American Zinc, Lead & Smelting Co., a gentleman whom I happen to know reasonably well personally. From his testimony our committee understood that, first, portal-to-portal suits previously filed against his company total over $7,200,000; and second, that sum is considerably in excess of the company's net working capital as of the end of November 1946, which was approximately $6,600,000.

Mr. President, we made inquiry not only of men in industry but also of representatives of the War and Navy Departments, as to the effect in their judgment upon the financial position of companies which follows from the institution of suits of the magnitude of those to which I have referred this afternoon. I call attention to the testimony of Mr. Foster, Under Secretary of the Department of Commerce, appearing at page 618 of the hearings. He was questioned as follows:

Senator DONNELL. May I ask at that point whether you could give us your best judgment as to the effect, generally, upon companies which are parties defendant to such suits during the tedious and uncertain processes of recovery to which you refer?

Mr. FOSTER. I think that bears on the main thesis of our concern here, Mr. Chairman, which is the uncertainty which would be generated by this liability hanging over the head of any business manager. It would inhibit any bold planning or action, in any direction; such as to maintain production, to maintain high levels of employment, and even to affect directly his ability to carry out his normal business.

Senator DONNELL. How about the effect, if any, upon his ability to borrow money from financial institutions?

Mr. FOSTER. I think if I were a banker, and I am not, that certainly I would be tempted to be much more cautious in making advances with the thought of a liability of this character in the background.

The same witness, Mr. Foster, who, I repeat, is Under Secretary of Commerce, and is not interested in the matter other than from the standpoint of a public official, testified at page 608 as follows:

Mr. FOSTER. The Department of Commerce, pursuant to its responsibility to promote commerce and industry, has been deeply concerned over the large amount of litigation which has followed the decision of the Supreme Court in the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case.

Leaders in the business community have come to the Department to express their alarm over the impact of this litigation on the industry of the country.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Foster, if you do not mind an interruption, I would like to interrupt here.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Would you be kind enough to state at this time, something as to whether or not it is a considerable number of leaders or just one or two who have appeared.

Mr. FOSTER. That represents, Mr. Chairman, representatives of a number, I should say, although we have had numerous individuals.

It is reflected in a group by the Business Advisory Council of the Department, consisting of many leaders of industry who advise with the Secretary of Commerce.

It is not, however, confined to that, since we have had other individual leaders and their representatives come and express concern over the situation.

I call especial attention to this portion of the testimony:

Senator DONNELL. Do the leaders who have thus appeared, expressed their alarm over the impact of this litigation on the industry all over the country, do they come from various parts of the United States or are they concentrated in one part?

Mr. FOSTER. They represent practically the entire country geographically.

Mr. President, I also call attention to a statement from which I quoted a little while ago. It is the statement of the subcommittee of the Business Advisory Council, and the following portion appears at page 615 of the hearings:

The amounts presently involved in lawsuits already filed are astronomical and yet they cover only some 10 percent of the total number of employees subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act. Whatever the final amounts which might be awarded by the courts if the present judicial interpretation stands, it is clear that the extent of litigation, the cost of defense, and the potential liabilities constitute such a burden on industry as to force many companies into bankruptcy and to disrupt seriously the whole economy.

That is the opinion of the subcommittee of the Business Advisory Council, and as I recall it was confirmed by the Business Advisory Council itself.

A little while ago I was commenting upon Mr. Young's testimony. I should also have mentioned in that connection an excerpt from the testimony of Mr. Eugene E. Wilson, chairman of the board of governors of the Aircraft Industries Association. In that connection I call attention to the importance of the development of the aircraft industries, and I refer to its importance from every standpoint, including the standpoint of commerce and the standpoint of national defense, to which our minds gravitate year after year. Mr. Wilson made the following statement:

I am really here today to present to this committee the industry's conviction that unless there is really some prompt action in Congress to relieve the threat of disaster that is posed by portal-to-portal pay suits that our industry just really faces destruction.

At this point, Mr. President, I pause in the reading to emphasize that not merely from the standpoint of dollars and cents, but from the standpoint of national defense, these portal-to-portal cases present a vast obstacle to the proper development of our national considerations which manifest themselves in appropriate development of the aircraft industry. There sits ordinarily but a few seats from me—he is out of the Chamber at the moment—the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] who spoke earlier this afternoon. He called to our attention two instances of what occurred in his State by the mere institution of a suit. I should say in passing that doubtless his State is, I assume, in the minority as to giving to a plaintiff the right to attach the property of a defendant without bond or in the absence of extraordinary circumstances. The junior Senator from Connecticut stated to us that—

In Connecticut, when a suit is instituted in the State courts, a writ of attachment is issued by virtue of which the sheriff can make attachment on the property or funds of the defendant.

I digress to apply that to the situation under consideration. Let us consider a suit filed against one of these companies, and let us assume that a large amount is involved in the suit. In the Connecticut case the plaintiff is entitled to a writ of attachment by which the sheriff can attach the property or funds of the defendant.

The Senator from Connecticut, continuing, said:

In two instances in Connecticut—that is, suits against the Allison Co. of Bridgeport, and the Seymour Manufacturing Co. of Seymour—attachments were made which very seriously affected the company's business. One company had to close its doors and the other had to borrow money to meet its pay roll because its funds in the bank were under attachment. This illustrates the serious effect upon employment generally that such suits may have unless some remedial action is immediately forthcoming.

Mr. President, the employment records of our country show the tremendous burden that is cast upon management in the very preservation and examination of the records of the respective companies in order to defend against these suits. I shall mention in a moment an illustrative case which I think is of interest. Before doing that, however, I desire to revert once more to the testimony of Mr. Hook, the president of the American Rolling Mill Co., with respect to the retardation of future programs, including expansion plans, which retardation inevitably results from the existence of suits of the type and amount involved in the portal-to-portal situation. Said Mr. Hook:

> We have under construction and under way, under authority of our board of directors, improvements and things of that kind—which amount to $58,432,810, and against that program we have still to spend $36,236,121. Well, now, with the possibility of liability overhanging our heads for an indeterminate amount which may reach $60,000,000 or what not, we have got to seriously stop, look, and listen and think of what we are going to do about that, Senator, at our next board meeting.

Obviously, Mr. President, with companies sued for vast amounts, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Pressman, in his testimony before our committee, undertook to make the observation—and perhaps he was right about it—that the figures that are filed in the cases are obviously in excess of the amount for which recovery may be had; nevertheless, let us put ourselves in the place of a company's board of directors faced by a suit involving more than the company's net worth, regardless of what we think may be the ultimate recovery, when we are faced with a decision as to whether we will go ahead with an expansion plan.

Let us put ourselves in the place of a bank to whom application is made for a loan—not only the board of directors, and the bank itself, but the State banking commissioner, who will insist on a strict scrutiny of every loan. Let us put ourselves in the position of such a bank, where a loan is sought by a company which has such a suit threatened against it. It requires no further argument on my part to demonstrate that there is a retardation of industry which must be taken into account, and goes down to the very grass roots of our country, as I shall indicate later, in the rural districts, as well as in the city districts. But I was about to mention the burden on management in preserving and examining the employment records which would perhaps have to be examined under the burden-of-proof theory set forth and adjudicated by the court in the Mount Clemens case.

I should like to place in the RECORD a paragraph or two from a letter of January 24, 1947, from Bryan, Cave, McPheeters & Roberts, attorneys at law, St. Louis, Mo., as follows:

> As you undoubtedly know, the form of petition used in most of the suits brought by the CIO has attached to it an interrogatory which calls upon the company to prepare from its record and furnish to the plaintiffs certain information needed by the plaintiffs to support the allegations of their petition and to prove, in part, their cases. The comptroller of one of our clients has made an estimate of the work which would be involved in, and the cost to the company of, answering this interrogatory with respect to the approximately 1,500 names of employees listed in the petition.

I pause in the reading, Mr. President, to say that obviously the number of names does not indicate that this is one of the great outstanding, enormous corporations. It seems to have only about 300 more persons named as plaintiffs than were named in the Mount Clemens case. I continue:

> He estimates—

That is, the comptroller estimates—

> He estimates that the company would have to examine 4,333,500 separate time tickets, clock cards, and other pay-roll records, that this task would require 235,521 hours of accounting and clerical work, that it would require a staff of 100 people in excess of 1 year to accumulate and report the detailed information requested, and that it would cost approximately $295,000 in wages alone. While the petition in question covers only approximately 1,500 employees, this particular company, during a substantial part of the period covered by the suit—

I think I was in error in assuming this was a small company, because the letter proceeds to state a fact which I had overlooked, as follows:

> This particular company, during a substantial part of the period covered by the suit had more than 10,000 employees, so that the potential cost of answering this one interrogatory, if all eligible employees should join in the suit, would be far in excess of the estimate of $295,000.
> This is cited as an illustration of the prohibitive expense to which the defendants in these suits will be put merely for the purpose of supplying the plaintiffs with information needed to prosecute their claims. The additional cost to the defendants of preparing these cases for trial, regardless of the ultimate outcome, will be staggering.

I shall not dwell further upon illustrations of the enormous expense involved in merely defending the cases, regardless of the outcome. I revert to the fact that Mr. Pressman's contention is that although the suits are in large amount, after all we need not be so much worried about it, because they might simmer down into comparatively small amounts. Yet if his position be correct, the amount involved in making the preparation of the case and trying it will be tremendous and vast, as I have indicated.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I observe that it is now after 5 o'clock, and I inquire of the majority leader what his intentions are as to the session this evening.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will yield further, it is not the intention to hold an evening session. As to whether we should conclude now or half an hour from now I should feel was wholly within the discretion of the Senator from Missouri. He has held the floor for a little more than 2 hours. Whether he could conclude within a reasonable time this evening or not I have no knowledge. I am perfectly willing to do anything that is agreeable to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I greatly appreciate the consideration of the distinguished majority leader. In my opinion the factual presentation will require probably another hour. Furthermore, we will then come to the presentation of the bill itself, and I should like to have the privilege, if Senators will be kind enough to bear with me, to explain the bill in detail, because it is a measure on which we have put a great deal of labor and which will require a detailed explanation. I think the Senate is entitled to have the bill explained section by section, and in part, sentence by sentence.

Moreover, I hope, with all due modesty, that we may have present as many of the Members of the Senate as possible to hear the discussion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], and myself regarding the constitutional phase of the bill. I should require in all two or two and a half hours more in order to complete the presentation of the factual and the legal situation.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DONNELL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I did not want anything I may have indicated to be construed as a desire to restrict the Senator in his presentation, in any way, because I realize that it is important. I want the Senator to have all the time that is needed. I was merely concerned about whether we should continue this afternoon, or allow the matter to go over until tomorrow.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I did not draw an inference of the slightest criticism from the remarks of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. I can readily understand how he might have well criticized me because of the length of my presentation. I think, though, Mr. President, that this subject is one of such vital importance, and the facts are so varied and widespread, it is almost impossible, at least for me, to present them in less than the time I have indicated; but I want to assure the Senator that I find him today, as always, characterized by courtesy and kindness toward me.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Does the Senator desire to proceed this afternoon, or would he be willing to relinquish the floor with the understanding that he may be recognized and continue on Monday? I want the decision to be that of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I may say that I have no objection to continuing, but the Senate has endured the ordeal of having had to listen to me for more than 2 hours this afternoon, and I have no doubt that many of the Senators would like to leave. My own judgment is it would be better to recess or adjourn, as the case may be, until Monday.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. In the course of his discussion of the bill itself, is the Senator going to show to the Members of the Senate that it is possible to outlaw nuisance suits without outlawing legitimate suits for back pay? That seems to be the big question in the minds of a good many persons, including myself. I realize that there are two classes of suits which have been brought; one being those which are purely nuisance suits, brought for the purpose of embarrassing the employer, and with the mistaken idea that the union was going to make bargaining capital out of it. But there must be a good many times when legitimate suits are brought for back pay. Is the bill going to outlaw the nuisance suits and still make it permissible to bring legitimate suits?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I think that the bill sets forth to the best of the ability of the Committee on the Judiciary the rule which should be followed uniformly, in the first instance, taking up existing suits; and, in the second instance, taking up new suits. They are treated quite differently. By "new suits," I mean suits which arise after the passage of the act.

I do not want to guarantee to the Senator or to anyone else that there may not be some resulting instances of injustice. I think it has been demonstrated time and time again that almost any type of legislation may work some injustice. For instance, in the first report of the House Committee on Labor, accompanying the Fair Labor Standards Act, occurs the statement:

> A few may suffer some inconvenience, possibly financial loss, for a short time; but the fact that a tremendous number of injustices will be cured by the bill fully justifies the inconveniece and even the loss—

And so forth. Mr. President, we certainly shall endeavor to demonstrate to the Senate the fact that our bill takes an appalling national problem and solves the problem to the very best of the ability of our committee, and in a way which we think is accompanied by a minimum of deprivations, or a minimum of injustices.

It is very difficult to answer the Senator's question "Yes" or "No," without developing the facts.

Mr. AIKEN. Suppose it develops that the employees of a certain industry have failed to collect regular overtime pay due them over the past; will this bill permit them to collect it, if the employer is unwilling to pay it? Can they go to court to collect it?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, if any employee is able to show either that he has a contract or that there is a customary practice, under which he is entitled to collect his money, he will be able to collect. That is the answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. AIKEN. How about the man who does not belong to a union at all, and is not financially able to go to the expense of making such a showing?

Mr. DONNELL. The answer to that is that any plaintiff in any case must make out his case, no matter how rich or how poor he may be. I undertake to say that under the law as laid down, if our bill should be passed, any plaintiff who could show either that he had a contract or that there was a customary practice in the plant or other place of work in which he was employed, entitling him to compensation, would obtain the compensation to which he laid claim.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it fair, in answering the question of the Senator from Vermont, to say that this proposed legislation is aimed to defeat those causes of action that are solely under the Fair Labor Standards Act?

Mr. DONNELL. Of course, the bill also applies to the Walsh-Healey and the Bacon-Davis Acts.

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; it applies to the three acts, but there may be a cause of action under the common law or under a practice or a custom or a contract in pursuance of which recovery could be had. It may be desired to include a definition of a nuisance suit, which is a suit that does not come within the law; as I understand, a nuisance suit which would have no foundation at all, but was brought merely for the purpose of coercion. We are not dealing with that kind of suit, nor do I admit that these suits in question are such suits. I think they are brought by virtue of the three acts which have been mentioned and the decision of the Supreme Court, which says that the three acts, in and of themselves, give certain causes of action, without any contract, without any custom, or without any common law right. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct; and I may add to what the Senator said, though it is merely repeating a part of what he said, that the pending bill does not deprive any person of any right which he may have had under the common law.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I merely rose to say to the Senator that, from the statement he just made, I surmise the details of the bill will be fully explained by him on Monday.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

Mr. HATCH. At that time all these questions will be answered?

Mr. DONNELL. I shall endeavor to answer every question that I can.

Mr. HATCH. My suggestion was that we might follow the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri to recess at this time, until Monday, and let the Senator explain the bill fully and in detail, in answer to all questions, at that time.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I should like to add for the record of today that this bill would not strike at the heart of or defeat any cause of action that arose out of a State statute.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct. The Federal Government has absolutely no power, as I see it, to cancel a right existing under State statute. At any rate, we do not undertake to assert any such power.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Missouri yields the floor with the understanding he will be recognized when the Senate resumes its sessions on Monday.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent of such Senators as are present to be absent on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted.

CONVEYANCE OF EASEMENTS IN CERTAIN LANDS TO AMERICAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 220) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to convey to American Telephone & Telegraph Co. an easement for communication purposes in certain lands situated in Virginia and Maryland, which was, on page 3, strike out lines 16 and 17.

Mr. GURNEY. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments, for the proposed action is of advantage to the Government.

The motion was agreed to.

CONVEYANCE OF EASEMENTS IN CERTAIN LANDS TO VIRGINIA ELECTRIC & POWER CO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 221) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to grant and convey to the Virginia Electric & Power Co., a perpetual easement in two strips of land comprising portions of the Norfolk Navy Yard, Portsmouth, Va., and for other purposes, which were, on page 1, line 8, to strike out the words "without cost to said corporation"; on page 2, line 15, after the word "Company", to insert the word "of"; on the same page, line 19, to strike out the words "without cost to said corporation"; and on page 3, line 4, to strike out the words "without cost to said corporation."

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments. This matter deals with a right-of-way across land in Virginia, and the Senate should concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, some routine nominations in the junior grades, ensigns, lieutenants, and one or two captains, and some others, on which I shall ask unanimous consent for action at this time. What causes my request at this moment is the fact that there are two colonels to be made professors at the Military Academy. Therefore it is my purpose to ask that, as in executive session, the routine nominations be acted on at this time.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from South Dakota to withhold his request, because I was about to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Carroll Miller, of Pennsylvania, to be an Interstate Commerce Commissioner for a term expiring December 31, 1953. (Reappointment.)

By Mr. MILLIKIN, from the Committee on Finance:

James R. Wade to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 45, with headquarters at St. Louis, Mo. (Reappointment.)

By Mr. TOBEY, from the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Harry A. McDonald, of Michigan, to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission for the remainder of the term expiring June 5, 1951; and Henry Earl Cook, of Ohio, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation for the unexpired term of 6 years from September 6, 1945.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY—NOMINATION REPORTED ADVERSELY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Gordon R. Clapp, of Tennessee, to be a member of the board of directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority for the remainder of the term expiring 9 years after May 18, 1945, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the nomination be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nomination will be passed over.

INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Eugene R. Black, of New Jersey, to be United States Executive Director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for a term of 2 years and until his successor has been appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Joseph K. Carson, Jr., of Oregon, to be a member for the term expiring September 25, 1952.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that the nominations to the Atomic Energy Commission be passed over en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nominations to the Atomic Energy Commission will be passed over en bloc.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of A. Devitt Vanech, of Connecticut, to be an Assistant Attorney General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John D. Clifford, Jr., of Maine, to be United States district judge for the district of Maine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John E. Peurifoy, of South Carolina, to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Public Health Service.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that the nominations in the Public Health Service be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that the President be notified of all nominations this day confirmed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

ROUTINE PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY, NAVY, AND MARINE CORPS

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, from the Committee on Armed Services I report favorably routine nominations in the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps and ask for their immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota reports certain nominations in the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps and asks for their present consideration without their going to the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if these are nominations which have just been reported from the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. GURNEY. They have been ready to report since March 5, and I have had them in my desk ready to report them, but have not done so heretofore because I could not obtain the floor prior to this time. They are routine nominations in the armed services in the junior grades. They are all routine and in accordance with regular custom.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am quite sure the Senator from South Dakota would not present nominations of this kind if he knew that any objections whatever could be made to them.

Mr. GURNEY. The nominations were unanimously approved by the committee.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the nominations in the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps reported from the Committee on Armed Services by the Senator from North Dakota are confirmed, and the President will be immediately notified.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if there be no further executive business, as in legislative session, I move that the Senate stand in recess until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, March 17, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 14 (legislative day of February 19), 1947:

HOUSE COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE

The full committee will meet Monday, March 17, at 10 a. m., in room 213, House Office Building, to continue hearings on H. R. 2408.

SENATE

MONDAY, MARCH 17, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 19, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord Jesus, we turn in confidence unto Thee, since Thou wast tempted in all points like as we are, and yet without sin. Help us, that we may obtain victory over our temptations. We feel ashamed that we have so little power in our lives, and so often fall at the same old hurdles. Sometimes we grow discouraged and filled with doubts when we see so little evidence of growth in grace, in faith, and in spiritual perception.

We know that we are not what we ought to be; and we know that we are not yet what we will be; but we thank Thee that we are not what we once were. For whatever progress Thou hast made with us we give Thee thanks, and by Thy grace we are kept from despair. Help us to remember that they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength. May we wait and be made strong. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, March 14, 1947, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 220. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to convey to American Telephone & Telegraph Co. an easement for communication purposes in certain lands situated in Virginia and Maryland; and

S. 221. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to grant and convey to the Virginia Electric & Power Co. a perpetual easement in two strips of land comprising portions of the Norfolk Navy Yard, Portsmouth, Va., and for other purposes.

INVITATION FOR REPRESENTATIVES OF SENATE TO VISIT CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to make an announcement. On February 11, 1947, the State Department submitted to the Senate a communication from the distinguished Ambassador from Czechoslovakia transmitting a generous invitation to the Senate from the National Constitutional Assembly of the Czechoslovak Republic to send a delegation to visit Czechoslovakia.

The invitation was referred to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The committee has instructed me to express the deep appreciation of the Senate for this gracious expression of good will and to assure the Government of Czechoslovakia of its deep anxiety to embrace every opportunity further to cement our good relations.

I have been further instructed to say that the burden of responsibilities on the Senate is the sole reason why the Senate is unable to accept the invitation at the present time.

The letter addressed to the Ambassador from Czechoslovakia under date of March 17, 1947, will be printed at this point in the RECORD, without objection.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 17, 1947.

Dr. JURAJ SLAVIK,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary,
Embassy of Czechoslovakia,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: Your gracious letter and invitation of January 30, 1947, addressed to the President pro tempore of the Senate, was presented by me to the full Senate and referred to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

The committee is deeply appreciative of the invitation from the Czechoslovak National Constitutional Assembly suggesting that a delegation from the United States Senate should visit your great country and it instructs me to inform you and your Government of our desires to take advantage of every possible opportunity to strengthen the ties of mutual friendship and understanding between the United States and Czechoslovakia. Your invitation typifies a spirit of good will which we heartily reciprocate. Unfortunately the pressures upon the Senate are such that we cannot anticipate at the present time when it might be possible for a committee of the Senate to accept your invitation. I am sure you will be fully aware of the great responsibilities confronting the Senate for some months to come. Therefore, I have no present alternative except to suggest that we shall hope to be able to give more responsive attention to your invitation at a later date.

We cherish the warmest sentiments of friendly interest in the Czechoslovak National Constitutional Assembly and in the welfare of the Czechoslovak Republic. Whenever and wherever it is possible to cement these ties between us we shall welcome the opportunity and the privilege. I shall be indebted to you if you will inform your government of this response to its deeply appreciated invitation.

With sentiments of great respect and warm personal regards.

Cordially and faithfully,

A. H. VANDENBERG,
President pro tempore and Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AUDIT REPORT OF TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report of the Tennessee Valley Authority for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1945, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE NATIONAL DEFENSE PROGRAM

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program may have a brief executive session this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules and Administration may be privileged to meet tomorrow afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask consent of the Senate that the Committee on Banking and Currency may meet tomorrow while the Senate is in session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. DONNELL obtained the floor.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. WHITE:

Petitions of sundry citizens of Bangor and Springdale, Maine, praying for the enactment of Senate bill 265, to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"Concurrent resolution relating to the school-lunch program

"Whereas the Federal Government has been offering the States assistance to develop and expand school-lunch programs, and after extended hearing the Seventy-ninth Congress passed the National School Lunch Act, which was signed by the President June 4, 1946, and became Public Law 396; and

"Whereas section 2 of this act reads as follows: 'It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress, as a measure of national security, to safeguard the health and well-being of the Nation's children and to encourage the domestic consumption of nutritious agricultural commodities and other food, by assisting the States, through grants-in-aid and other means, in providing an adequate supply of foods and other facilities for the establishment, maintenance, operation, and expansion of nonprofit school-lunch program'; and

"Whereas South Carolina is meeting its share of the costs as required by law, and is complying with other phases of the act; and

"Whereas school officials and the public in general consider the school-lunch program one of the most important Federal aided activities in the State and Nation; and

"Whereas the basis for strengthening our Nation is through better nutrition for our school children and a wider market for the products of our farms; and

"Whereas nothing is more important in our national life than the welfare of our children and proper nourishment comes first in attaining this welfare; and

"Whereas if Congress should fail to make necessary financial provisions, the school-lunch program in South Carolina would come to a close in most of our small and poorer schools: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the South Carolina delegation in the National Congress are hereby urged to support deficiency appropriation for carrying the school-lunch program for the current year, and an appropriation for continuing the program for the next year (1947–1948); and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the clerk of the senate to Senators and Representatives in Congress from South Carolina, in Washington."

By Mr. YOUNG:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 13

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America endorsing equal rights for women

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring therein):

"Whereas the women of America have shared equally with men in the hardships and sacrifices incident to the building of this Nation; and

"Whereas they have shared equally in the pain and distress which have been involved in the maintenance of the American Republic and the ideals of free government against the aggression of tyrants and have participated, and are today participating, in the battles precipitated by the enemies of freedom; and

"Whereas this Nation was conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal and such declaration has no actual or implied limitations on equality before the law by reason of sex; and

"Whereas the rights of women before the law are much abridged in many States, and this legal discrimination on the basis of sex constitutes an intolerable burden upon thousands of women who are solely dependent upon their own efforts for their livelihood, and is a source of irritation to many thousands of others who recognize in this discrimination a flat contradiction of the American principle of equality, wholly out of accord with the status of American women, which they have reached by their achievements in other fields of human endeavor; and

"Whereas there are today 985,000 more women than men in this country and women have served this country in time of war as well as in peace, equally well with men in every field of work: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the senate and house of representatives pass the following resolution and the amendment as follows:

"'EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

"'Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex. Congress and the several States shall have the power within the respective jurisdictions to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"'This amendment shall take effect 3 years after the date of ratification'; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the United States Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of Congress elected from the State of North Dakota."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 23

"Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to construct a psychopathic hospital for veterans in the State of North Dakota and until such time as such hospital is constructed to pay for the transportation charges for the commitment of psychopathic veterans to governmental institutions in adjoining States

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring therein):

"Whereas the State of North Dakota is one of the many States that does not have a veterans' hospital for psychopathic patients; and

"Whereas due to this factor mental patients have had to be transported to veterans' hospitals in adjoining States for commitment; and

"Whereas the Veterans' Administration, due to existing law, is unable and has therefore refused to pay for the travel expense involved in the commitment of such veteran to a mental institution in an adjoining State; and

"Whereas the counties have been required to assume the transportation costs of such veterans to other States, even though the sheriff has had no authority to collect expenses for out-of-State travel: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we, the members of the Thirtieth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, respectfully memorialize and petition Congress and the Veterans' Administration that in the future hospital-building program of the Veterans' Administration that a site for a psychopathic hospital be selected in North Dakota and that such a hospital be constructed and maintained in this State for the benefit of the veterans of this State and their families; be it further

"Resolved, That until such time as such hospital is constructed and in operation in this State, that we petition Congress to amend the laws pertaining to the Veterans' Administration to provide that the Veterans' Administration will assume and be held responsible for the transportation of psychopathic veterans to governmental institutions in adjoining States; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby directed to send copies of this resolution to North Dakota's Representatives and Senators in Congress, United States Veterans' Bureau, Veterans' Service Commissioner, and to the Greater North Dakota Association."

Two concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Public Works:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION P

"Concurrent resolution expressing the support of the people of North Dakota for the development of the Missouri River and its tributaries, and petitioning Congress to continue its support

"Whereas the several departments of the United States Government have prepared and adopted a plan for the development of the physical resources of the Missouri River Basin; and

"Whereas that plan was approved and authorized for construction by the Congress of the United States in the Flood Control Act of 1944; and

"Whereas appropriations for such development have already been made by the Congress of the United States and such works are now under way; and

"Whereas successful completion of said plan will bring untold benefits to the people of the Missouri Basin and to the people of the United States as a whole by increasing industrial, agricultural, and economic opportunity, and by stabilizing the business, industry, and agriculture now existent in the Missouri Basin: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Represeniatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring), That we hereby express the support of the people of North Dakota for this development of the Missouri River and its tributaries and that we respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to continue its support of this development and to make the necessary appropriation to carry on this work without delay, and that the secretary of state be authorized and directed to transmit a certified copy of this resolution to Senators YOUNG and LANGER and to Congressmen ROBERTSON and LEMKE at Washington, D. C."

"House Concurrent Resolution V

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to extend the time for availability of funds under the Federal Aid Act of 1944

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein):

"Whereas, the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1944 authorized the apportionment of certain funds for each of the first three successive postwar fiscal years for Federal aid highways, the Federal aid secondary roads, and for projects on the Federal aid highway system in urban areas; and

"Whereas section 4 (d) of said act provides that any sums so apportioned to any State shall be available for expenditure in such State for only 1 year after the close of the fiscal year for which it is apportioned and that any sum so apportioned that remains unexpended at the end of such period shall lapse and revert to the Treasury of the United States; and

"Whereas the aforesaid provisions of section 4 (d) of said act will operate to cause each State to lose any portion of such funds apportioned to it for the first postwar fiscal year that may not be expended by June 30, 1947; and for the second postwar fiscal year not be expended by June 30, 1948; and for the third postwar fiscal year not expended by June 30, 1949; and

"Whereas the highway departments of many of the States are certain that the elements of inflation and the acute shortages of labor and engineering personnel, materials, and equipment that are known to exist will make it impossible to have these funds expended within the time now prescribed by said act, and said highway departments and the public generally realize that the need for the expenditure of such funds on highway work is, and will be, more intensified by reason of obsolescence, deterioration, increased unit costs, and ever-mounting traffic volumes: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be and hereby is memorialized and petitioned to enact suitable legislation to extend the periods of availability of such funds for 12 months after June 30 of each of the years 1947, 1948, and 1949; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to the Federal Works Administrator, and the Commissioner of Public Roads of the United States, and to North Dakota's delegation in Congress."

Three concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"House Concurrent Resolution K

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation barring all forms of liquor advertising from interstate mails, from radio and motion picture programs

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That the Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota does hereby memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States to enact legislation now introduced in the Senate of the United States to bar all forms of liquor advertising from interstate mails and from radio and motion picture programs. It is the sense of the house of representatives and the senate that such liquor advertisements coming through the interstate mails and over the radio and in motion picture programs are detrimental to the morals, health, and safety of the people, and particularly to the youth of our country, and, therefore, should be banned and barred from all interstate mails, radio, and motion picture programs; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send copies of this resolution properly authenticated to the presiding officer of each House of the National Congress and to each of the United States Senators and Representatives from the State of North Dakota."

"House Concurrent Resolution M

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Civil Aeronautics Board for early consideration in providing a northern area of the United States as the crow flies from Duluth, Minn., to Seattle, Wash., with regular air transportation serving Chicago via the Twin Cities and Duluth and the intermediate points of Grand Forks, Devils Lake, Minot, Williston, Glasgow, Havre, Great Falls, Kalispell, and Spokane

"Whereas there is no transcontinental air service between Lake Superior and Seattle along the Northern part of the United States; and

"Whereas said territory can well support such service and is in fact operating one of the most successful railroad operations in the Nation; and

"Whereas applications are pending on the part of air transport companies for such authority, and

"Whereas all of the cities and trade areas affected are desirous of having such service; and

"Whereas said service appears to be both economical and feasible and necessary in the best interests of the country; and

"Whereas no through service is available from the intermediate territory to important commercial and industrial centers of the country East or West: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That the Members of Congress from this State be requested to lend every effort towards the establishment of such service by presenting this resolution to the Civil Aeronautics Board and in person reporting to said Board the lack of transportation by air above set forth. Let copies of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to the Honorable WILLIAM LANGER and the Honorable MILTON R. YOUNG, Members of the United States Senate, and to the Honorable WILLIAM LEMKE and the Honorable CHARLES R. ROBERTSON, Members of Congress from North Dakota."

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 20

"Concurrent resolution demanding the removal of all controls over boxcar supply and distribution and allowing railroads to govern and allocate such equipment according to the needs of its patrons

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring therein):

"Whereas the supply of grain boxcars has been short of actual needs for this territory and as a result thereof there has been a great financial loss to producers and country elevators; and

"Whereas our railroads serving this territory have been forced to operate on approximately 50 percent of their own equipment while many eastern roads have been given 150 percent and more of car supply for l. c. l. freight; and

"Whereas impractical direction of transportation by the Office of Defense Transportation has resulted in discrimination against producers of this section in favor of eastern manufacturers and processors; and

"Whereas the evidence clearly indicates that arbitrary Office of Defense Transportation orders have been the cause of maldistribution of available boxcar supply and consequent backing up of food supplies in the country: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all controls over the supply and distribution of boxcars be removed and that the authority be given the various railroad units to govern and allocate their equipment according to the needs of their own patrons in keeping with a normal connecting line arrangement necessary to the operation of all American railroads; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to the President of the United States, the Association of American Railroads, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to North Dakota's delegation in Congress."

Three concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Public Lands:

"House Concurrent Resolution N

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to open for homestead entry the submarginal lands in the State of North Dakota for the benefit and rehabilitation of veterans of World War II

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That the Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota does hereby memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States to enact legislation opening for homestead entry for the purpose of rehabilitation of veterans of World War II, all submarginal lands in the State of North Dakota. That certified copies of this resolution properly authenticated be sent by the secretary of state to the Presiding Officer of each House of the National Congress and to each of the United States Senators and Representatives from North Dakota."

"House Concurrent Resolution Y

"Concurrent resolution urging the enactment of H. R. 1113 of the Eightieth Congress authorizing the removal of restrictions by the United States Government on land and land interests of Indian veterans

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein):

"Whereas the House of Representatives of the Eightieth Congress of the United States has before it H. R. 11133 providing that the Secretary of the Interior, upon an application by any Indian who shall have served honorably in the armed forces of the United States in time of war, may remove all restrictions upon the lands, interests in lands, funds, or other property of such Indian, and if such lands or interests are held by the United States in trust for such Indian, to issue an unrestricted patent in fee therefor: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That we recommend the passage of H. R. 1113 of the Eightieth Congress of the United States as soon as possible and substantially in the form introduced; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state is directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress, to the chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress, and to North Dakota's delegation in the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States."

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 26

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to create a Roosevelt Memorial Park in the Bad Lands area of the State of North Dakota

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring therein):

"Whereas the Honorable WILLIAM LEMKE of the Eightieth Congress of the United States has introduced in the Congress of the United States H. R. 731, for the purpose of creating and establishing a Theodore Roosevelt National Park and to reconstruct the log cabin and other buildings used by Theodore Roosevelt during his residence in the State of North Dakota on the original ranch owned and operated by him and to erect a suitable memorial to the said Theodore Roosevelt in the village of Medora, Billings County, State of North Dakota; and

"Whereas the said land under the bill which is to be used as a park is now owned by the Federal Government or its subdivisions and will not take additional land out of production; and

"Whereas the natural beauty of the North Dakota Bad Lands is recognized throughout all of the United States as well as in the State of North Dakota: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota does hereby memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States to enact legislation favorable to H. R. 731, establishing and creating the said Roosevelt Memorial Park in the Bad Lands of North Dakota; be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution, properly authenticated, be sent forthwith by the secretary of state to the presiding officer of each House of Congress and to each of the United States Representatives and Senators from the State of North Dakota and to the chairman of the House Committee on Public Lands and to the President of these United States of America."

Four concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"House Concurrent Resolution C

"Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress of the United States to continue and expand the development of rural electrification throughout the United States

"Whereas electricity has become an absolute necessity, not only for urban centers, but for the farm population of the United States; and

"Whereas the use of electricity on a farm, for its effective and efficient management, is now and has been for some time a necessary source of power as well as convenience; and

"Whereas the rural population is entitled to the same conveniences and necessities as the urban population of the United States; and

"Whereas rural electrification has been made possible largely through the Rural Electrification Administration, which has proven itself and which has electrified thousands of farms throughout the United States that otherwise would not have been able to procure electrical power; and

"Whereas there seems to be widespread publicity indicating some misunderstanding and perhaps hostility toward the Rural Electrification Administration; and

"Whereas the farmers of the United States deem rural electrification and its continued expansion one of the essential requirements of the modern age: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States continue the expansion and development of rural electrification in the United States, and that all necessary funds for use of rural electrification, and the building of rural electric lines and the organization of rural electrification cooperatives be amply provided, to the end that eventually all farm families be enabled to procure the service of electric power for the efficient management of their farms as well as their convenience; and be it further

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota, the Senate concurring therein, respectfully urge and request the Congress of the United States to continue to give its wholehearted support to rural electrification through helpful legislation and continued adequate appropriations; and that the Congress of the United States carefully study the needs of rural electrification, and that no attempt be made to stifle, stymie, or prevent the extension and expansion of rural electrification in the United States."

"House Concurrent Resolution W

"Concurrent resolution to the Congress of the United States petitioning Congress to strengthen present sanitary requirements governing the importation of livestock and livestock products and to appropriate additional funds to the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, in order that border inspection may be improved and a system of patrol established along the northern boundary of Mexico to guard against the importation of people, animals, and materials carrying the infection of foot and mouth disease, and also petitioning Congress to offer to the Government of the Republic of Mexico such facilities as may be available from the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, and appropriating money to provide for such facilities and to extend aid to the Government of the Republic of Mexico in order that foot-and-mouth disease may be eradicated

"To the President of the United States and to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

"Whereas foot-and-mouth disease now exists in livestock in the Republic of Mexico; and

"Whereas the disease has spread rapidly into a number of States in the vicinity of Mexico City and has now reached as far west and north as the state of Zacatecas; and

"Whereas it is extremely doubtful if the Government of the Republic of Mexico can eradicate this disease from their livestock without additional assistance; and

"Whereas the presence of foot-and-mouth disease in the Republic of Mexico presents a very definite threat to the prosperity of the livestock industry and the entire economic welfare of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Thirtieth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota (the Senate and House of Representatives concurring), That we earnestly petition the Congress of the United States to strengthen the present sanitary requirements governing the importation of livestock and livestock products from Mexico and from other countries in which foot-and-mouth disease exists; be it further

"Resolved, That we earnestly petition Congress to appropriate additional funds to the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, in order that border inspection may be improved and a system of patrol be established along the northern boundary of Mexico to guard against the importation of people, animals, and materials carrying the infection of foot-and-mouth disease; be it further

"Resolved, That we petition and urge the Congress of the United States to offer to the Government of the Republic of Mexico such facilities and assistance as may be available from the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, and to appropriate funds to provide for this assistance and to provide direct financial aid to the Government of the Republic of Mexico in order that foot-and-mouth disease be eradicated from their livestock; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this concurrent resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the United States and to the President pro tempore of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Honorable Secretary of State, the Honorable Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of North Dakota with the request that they bring this matter forcibly to the attention of the Members of the Congress of the United States."

VERNON M. JOHNSON,
Speaker of the House.
KENNETH L. MORGAN,
Chief Clerk of the House.
C. P. DAHL,
President of the Senate.
W. J. TROUT,
Secretary of the Senate.

Attest:

THOMAS HALL,
Secretary of State.

"House Concurrent Resolution Z

"Concurrent resolution petitioning Congress to enact permanent legislation to maintain a floor of not less than 90 percent of parity on all basic farm crops

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein):

"Whereas the gross debt of the Government of the United States has increased from about forty billion to about $260,000,000,000 during the period of World War II from 1939 to 1946; and

"Whereas interest must be paid annually and the debt gradually liquidated if the Government is to be saved from insolvency or bankruptcy; and

"Whereas it must be self-evident that if we are to avoid lower living standards and if this debt is to be serviced and paid, it must be through the production of new wealth from the natural resources of the United States; and

"Whereas the national income of the United States and the gross income of agriculture of this country have each only slightly more than doubled during the same time and these must bear the chief burden of taxes in maintaining the national solvency; and

"Whereas our gross farm income represents about 65 percent in dollar value of our annual production of new wealth, and in turn our national income regularly averages approximately seven times the dollar amount of gross farm income; and

"Whereas a return to the 1939 price and income levels for farm products would reduce our national income about 50 percent or from about one hundred sixty billion to less than $8,000,000,000: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That we hereby petition Congress to pass permanent legislation to maintain a floor of not less than 90 percent of parity on all basic farm crops, to protect such floor prices with commodity loans of like amount and to prescribe such import duties, excise taxes, or quotas on competitive imports as may be needed to maintain these price levels and our national income and to equalize the differential between the dollar value of our production and that of foreign counties; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution properly authenticated be forwarded by the secretary of state to the presiding officer of each House of the National Congress and to each of the United States Senators and Representatives from North Dakota."

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 21

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to provide funds for the payment of the difference between the ceiling price on flax and the price obtainable after the ceiling had been lifted

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring therein):

"Whereas the Federal Government during the summer of 1946 imposed a ceiling on flax of $4 per bushel; and

"Whereas such ceiling was given wide publicity in Government news releases and reports and stated that the farmer would receive no benefit by holding his flax for sale at a later date; and

"Whereas the public was warned that the stocks of oils would be the smallest in 30 years and the farmers were repeatedly urged by the Federal Government, its agencies, and representatives to market their flax; and

"Whereas many farmers of this State relying on such news releases and information cooperated with the Federal Government by marketing such flax to alleviate economic conditions and keep oil crushers in operation; and

"Whereas after the farmers had sold their flax, the Federal Government lifted the ceiling on flax on October 17, 1946, so that by October 25, 1946, the price of flax had zoomed 80 percent or to $7.25 per bushel; and

"Whereas the Federal Government at the time of imposing the ceiling on flax knew and had knowledge that the ceiling would be lifted as it had agreed to purchase from Argentina flax or its derivative, oil, the agreed price of which was the equivalent of $6 per bushel for Argentine flax; and

"Whereas the farmers have suffered a gross injustice due to their reliance upon the representations made by the Federal Government, its agencies and representatives: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we, the members of the Thirtieth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, respectfully memorialize Congress to provide to farmers who marketed their 1946 flax, sufficient Federal funds for the payment of the difference between the ceiling price on flax of $4 per bushel and the sum of $7.25 per bushel, which the farmers would have secured had they held their flax until the ceiling had been lifted; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, to the United States Senate, the United States House of Representatives and each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of North Dakota in the Congress of the United States."

PATRIOTS DAY

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen of the City of Medford, Mass., relating to the national recognition of April 19 as Patriots Day.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY OF MEDFORD,
March 4, 1947.

Be it resolved, That this board of aldermen does hereby recommend the favorable passage of a resolution entered in Congress by Representative E. N. ROGERS calling for the national recognition of April 19 as Patriots Day.

The resolution as introduced in Congress reads as follows: "Authorizing the President of the United States to proclaim April 19 of each year Patriots Day for the commemoration of the events that took place on April 19, 1775."

In board of aldermen, March 4, 1947, passed.

A true copy.

Attest:

GEORGE P. HASSETT,
City Clerk.

RECLAMATION PROJECTS AFFECTING NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD several resolutions adopted by the directors of the North Dakota Reclamation Association, Bismarck; the Board of County Commissioners of the County of Morton; the Board of County Commissioners of the County of Richland; the County Commissioners of Burke County; and the Carl Oftedahl Post, No. 127, of the American Legion, Bowbells, all in the State of North Dakota, dealing with the development of reclamation projects of interest to the State of North Dakota.

There being no objection, the resolutions were received, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred, as follows:

To the Committee on Public Lands:

"The following resolution was adopted by the directors of the North Dakota Reclamation Association at a meeting held on this 4th day of March 1947 at Bismarck, N. Dak.:

" 'Whereas we believe the cause of reclamation would be enhanced throughout the West by having the power of authorization of projects rest solely in the hands of the Congress of the United States; and

" 'Whereas the views of the Solicitor of the Interior Department are at variance with what we believe was the intent of Congress in the writing of the 1939 Reclamation Act in respect to the application of power revenues from multiple-purpose Federal reclamation projects; and

" 'Whereas due especially to present-day costs of reclamation projects, added to the fact that the less expensive reclamation development in the West has already been made, some revised formula should be adopted, based on principles fair to all sections of the Nation, and setting up tests of feasibility more workable than those in the 1939 act; and

" 'Whereas the National Reclamation Association, with which this association is affiliated, has at its last two annual conventions approved resolutions favoring the clarification of these matters; and

" 'Whereas remedial legislation has been submitted to the Eightieth Congress, through S. 539 and H. R. 1886, which we believe will accomplish these ends: Therefore be it

" 'Resolved, That the North Dakota Reclamation Association go on record as giving its unqualified endorsement to the provisions of these two measures; and that through its board of directors every effort be extended to bring about favorable consideration and final approval of one or both of these proposals; be it further

" 'Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to members of the North Dakota congressional delegation at Washington, to the chairman of the Public Lands Committee and Appropriations Committee of both the United States Senate and House of Representatives, to the Governor of North Dakota, and to the secretary of the National Reclamation Association.'

"Attest:

"J. I. ROVIG,
"Secretary."

To the Committee on Appropriations:

"The following resolution was adopted by the directors of the North Dakota Reclamation Association at a meeting held on this 4th day of March 1947 at Bismarck, N. Dak.:

" 'Whereas surveys and investigations have been carried on for a number of years on the projects in the Red River watershed by the Corps of Army Engineers; and

" 'Whereas immediate development of such projects is desperately needed to provide municipal and domestic water supply to the cities of Fargo, Grand Forks, Valley City, Lisbon, Grafton, Park River, and other cities of the Red River Valley: Therefore be it

" 'Resolved, That the directors of the North Dakota Reclamation Association urge Congress to provide funds to augment funds already made available for construction of Bald Hill Dam and that further appropriations be requested on projects recommended by the Corps of Army Engineers to alleviate the critical domestic water supply of cities adversely affected; be it further

" 'Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Governor of North Dakota, to the North Dakota congressional delegation at Washington, the Chief of Army Engineers, Washington, D. C.'

"Attest:

"J. I. ROVIG,
"Secretary."

"The following resolution was adopted by the directors of the North Dakota Reclamation Association at a meeting held on this 4th day of March 1947 in Bismarck, N. Dak.:

" 'Whereas surveys and investigations have advanced to a stage on the Heart River project, the Sheyenne Dam of the Missouri Souris project where construction could be started in 1947; and

" 'Whereas construction of these units are vital to the economic welfare and domestic water needs of North Dakota and the furtherance of the Missouri Basin water-development program; and

" 'Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation is charged with the responsibility of the construction of these projects: Therefore be it

" 'Resolved by the directors of the North Dakota Reclamation Association, That we urge Congress to provide the necessary funds to start actual construction of these units during the fiscal year 1948 so that these various units may proceed in an orderly manner to bring about the over-all development as authorized by Congress; be it further

" 'Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Governor of North Dakota, the North Dakota congressional delegation at Washington.'

"Attest:

"J. I. ROVIG,
"Secretary."

"The following resolution was adopted by the Board of County Commissioners of the County of Morton at a meeting held on this 5th day of March, 1947:

" 'Whereas surveys and investigations have advanced to a stage on the Heart River project, the Sheyenne Dam of the Missouri-Souris project, where construction could be started in 1947; and

" 'Whereas construction of these units are vital to the economic welfare and domestic water needs of North Dakota and the furtherance of the Missouri Basin Water Development program; and

" 'Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation is charged with the responsibility of the construction of these projects: Therefore be it

" 'Resolved by the Board of County Commissioners of the County of Morton, That we urge Congress to provide the necessary funds to start actual construction of these units during the fiscal year 1948, so that these various units may proceed in an orderly manner to bring about the over-all development, as authorized by Congress; be it further

" 'Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Governor of the State of North Dakota, the Honorable Fred G. Aandahl, and to the North Dakota delegation in Washington, Hon. William Langer, Hon. Milton R. Young, Hon. William Lemke, Hon. Charles R. Robertson.' "

" 'Whereas surveys and investigations have advanced to a stage on the Heart River project, the Sheyenne Dam of the Missouri-Souris project where construction could be started in 1947; and

" 'Whereas construction of these units are vital to the economic welfare and domestic water needs of North Dakota and the furtherance of the Missouri Basin water development program; and

" 'Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation is charged with the responsibility of the construction of these projects: Therefore be it

" 'Resolved by the Carl Oftedahl Post, No. 127, of the American Legion, of the city of Bowbells, N. Dak., That we urge Congress to provide the necessary funds to start actual construction of these units during the fiscal year 1948, so that these various units may proceed in an orderly manner to bring about the over-all-development, as authorized; be it further

" 'Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the North Dakota delegation in Washington, Hon. William Langer, Hon. Milton R. Young, Hon. William Lemke, Hon. Charles R. Robertson, and to the Governor of the State of North Dakota, the Honorable Fred G. Aandahl.'

"The foregoing resolution was adopted by the Carl Oftedahl Post, No. 127, of the American Legion, of Bowbells, N. Dak., at a meeting held on the 3d of March, 1947.

"CARL OFTEDAHL POST, No. 127,
"R. CURFU, Post Commander,

"Attest:

"C. H. RASMUSSEN, Adjutant."

"The following resolution was adopted by the Board of County Commissioners of Richland County at a meeting held on this 6th day of March 1947:

" 'Whereas surveys and investigations have advanced to a stage on the Heart River project, the Sheyenne Dam of the Missouri Souris project where construction could be started in 1947; and

" 'Whereas construction of these units are vital to the economic welfare and domestic water needs of North Dakota and the furtherance of the Missouri Basin water development program; and

" 'Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation is charged with the responsibility of the construction of these projects: Therefore be it

" 'Resolved by the Board of County Commissioners of Richland County, That we urge Congress to provide the necessary funds to start actual construction of these units during the fiscal year 1948, so that these various units may proceed in an orderly manner to bring about the over-all development, as authorized by Congress; be it further

" 'Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Governor of the State of North Dakota, the Honorable Fred G. Aandahl, and to the North Dakota delegation in Washington, Hon. William Langer, Hon. Milton R. Young, Hon. William Lemke, Hon. Charles R. Robertson.'

"On roll call all members present voted in favor of said resolution, and same was declared duly carried and adopted."

"The following resolution was adopted by the County Commissioners of the County of Burke at a meeting held on this 4th day of March 1947:

" 'Whereas surveys and investigations have advanced to a stage on the Heart River project, the Sheyenne Dam of the Missouri Souris project where construction could be started in 1947; and

" 'Whereas construction of these units are vital to the economic welfare and domestic water needs of North Dakota and the furtherance of the Missouri Basin water development program; and

" 'Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation is charged with the responsibility of the construction of these projects: Therefore be it

" 'Resolved by the Commissioners of Burke County, That we urge Congress to provide the necessary funds to start actual construction of these units during the fiscal year 1948, so that these various units may proceed in an orderly manner to bring about the over-all development, as authorized by Congress; be it further

"'Resolved, that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Governor of the State of North Dakota, the Honorable Fred G. Aandahl, and to the North Dakota delegation in Washington, Hon. William Langer, Hon. Milton R. Young, Hon. William Lemke, Hon. Charles R. Robertson.'

"The following resolution was adopted by the directors of the North Dakota Reclamation Association at a meeting held this 4th day of March 1947, at Bismarck, N. Dak.:

"'Whereas preliminary construction of highways, railroad connections and other facilities for the construction of the Garrison Dam and Reservoir have been well advanced; and

"'Whereas it is imperative that construction be commenced on the damsite, said reservoir being one of the key projects of the Missouri Basin development provided for in the Flood Control Act of 1944; and

"'Whereas the Corps of Army Engineers have already begun construction at the damsite with partial completion of the construction city of Riverdale and preparatory river testing to the starting of construction of the dam proper: Therefore be it

"'Resolved by the Directors of the North Dakota Reclamation Association, That we urge Congress to provide funds to permit actual construction on the dam to be advanced during the fiscal year 1948, with existing noncontingent limitations placed upon appropriations for such construction by the Congress, so that the various projects making up the whole may proceed uninterruptedly in realization of the coordinated Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin development plan; be it further

"'Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to members of the North Dakota congressional delegation at Washington, D. C., to the Governor of North Dakota, the Chief of Army Engineers, Washington.'

By Mr. JENNER:

S. J. Res. 89. Joint resolution to provide for the printing and distribution of certain matter relating to congressional activities authorized by section 221 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 to be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. WHERRY submitted an amendment and Mr. HOLLAND submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts, to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REDUCTION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME-TAX PAYMENTS—AMENDMENT

Mr. PEPPER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce individual income-tax payments, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

RESCISSION OF ORDER FOR PRINTING OF ANALYSIS OF HEARINGS ON GENERAL HOUSING BILL OF 1945

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order of the Senate of March 14, 1947, providing for the printing as a Senate document, with illustrations, an analysis of the hearings on the so-called Wagner-Ellender-Taft general housing bill, S. 1592, Seventy-ninth Congress, prepared by the Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress, and on the new bill recently introduced in the present Congress, be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRINTING OF SENATE REPORT 610, SEVENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, ENTITLED "SURVEY OF EXPERIENCES IN PROFIT SHARING AND POSSIBILITIES OF INCENTIVE TAXATION"

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in the Seventy-sixth Congress a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance consisting of the late Senator from Iowa, Mr. Herring, and myself, conducted a Nation-wide survey of profit sharing. As a result a report was printed in the Seventy-sixth Congress entitled "Survey of Experiences in Profit Sharing and Possibilities of Incentive Taxation," which is probably the best available encyclopedia on the subject. There have been very many demands for the report, and the copies made available have been exhausted. The Government Printing Office has sold 6,000 copies of the document, which would indicate its popularity.

At the urgent request of many who are interested in the availability of this report, on a subject which is coming to be of renewed, current interest, I am asking for an order to reprint the document. The order necessarily has to be in the form of a concurrent resolution. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to submit a concurrent resolution which I should like to have considered and acted upon at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 9) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 1,000 additional copies of Senate Report No. 610, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, being the report entitled "Survey of Experience in Profit Sharing and Possibilities of Incentive Taxation" which was printed as a report from a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Finance acting pursuant to Senate Resolution 215, Seventy-fifth Congress, agreed to May 18, 1938. Such addditional copies shall be for the use of the Senate Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LODGE

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point an address on the subject of foreign policy delivered by me before the Clover Club, Boston, on March 15.

Ther being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is no exaggeration to say that we are standing at a turning point in history, a turning point of the kind which happens only once in several centuries. We see all around us chaos, hatred and turmoil; we see old empires going down and new power combinations arising; we see the saturation of populations, coupled with the exhaustion of natural resources; we hear the talk of new wars and we see that the contest between democracy and totalitarianism which some thought had been settled on VE-day and VJ-day has not yet been laid to rest. More and more, people will realize in the next few months, if they do not realize it now, that the erstwhile great nations of western Europe can no longer be world powers and may not be able to stand up to Communist doctrines without outside help.

That there will, therefore, be demands on our generosity is almost a foregone conclusion. And that in the name of religion and humanitarianism we will respond to those demands is equally certain, because we, the descendants of immigrants, who sought to escape the curse of Europe, are a generous people.

We are now, however, asked by the President of the United States on his solemn responsibility to go further than that. He has courageously faced the challenge of Communist aggression and we must support him in principle, while we, your servants in Congress, decide what methods should be used. If the people and their Congress were to repudiate the President, the last hope of ever organizing peace would vanish. We can be sure of one thing; weakness will not avoid trouble. There is a much better chance that strength, guided by virtuous motives, will do so. Nor can I escape the thought that if this challenge had been faced much earlier we would not be needing to take these steps today. You can bargain better before the other fellow gets the stuff than you can afterward.

We now have the right and the duty to make conditions as to what we give or what we lend abroad without having our motives impugned. For example, these stricken nations should be stimulated to produce all that they can produce, and not to remain prostrate in the belief that we will go on forever feeding them a minimum ration. We must insist that American agents supervise the distribution of our American goods so that our money and goods go where they are intended and not to fatten any private pocket, foreign or domestic. We must demand that no American goods be used—as they have been in the recent past—to promote political ideologies that are hateful to us; that no government waste its substance on competitive armaments while receiving aid from us; and that our friends and former enemies return whatever is given them when they are able to do, either to us or to some international fund for future famine relief.

None can deny our right to make such conditions. Our people are heavily taxed. Even in our land, millions are close to the poverty line. Our resources are not inexhaustible; in fact, in many respects we are a have-not Nation. We cannot simply buy our way out.

What we may do in the immediate future must be made to square with the long range future and with our policy in other parts of the world. We must not resist communism in one place and appear to support it in others. We must by all means use our own American methods and not follow the outworn and unsuccessful methods of older nations. We must modernize and make effective our diplomacy. The old striped pants approach is as out of date as horse cavalry and is still all too often used because so many of our people don't know any better.

Gentlemen, we are in an unhappy and rather sickening moment. We don't like any part of it. At best we face a choice of the lesser of evils. But the one thing we cannot do is to avoid a decision, for refusing to make a decision in an affair of this kind is itself a decision. We are—and I am profoundly sorry to say it—deeply involved from a material, a spiritual, and an ideological standpoint. To give a clear warning that we refuse to be shut out of the Near East is not imperialism; it is not war mongering; it is not pulling chestnuts out of fires; it is not bailing out the oil companies. It is simple self-preservation.

I close with the suggestion that any policy we may follow in the future be an American policy; that, of course, we support the United Nations; that by our attitude and by our example we show the world what a success we can make of democracy; and that the one form of government which believes in the dignity of man and in his worthwhileness and importance has the vitality to survive and prosper, even while we are passing through the valley of the shadow.

ASSISTANCE TO GREECE

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. President, during the past few days I have deliberated and reflected, as seriously as I ever have done in my life about anything, upon the message concerning the Greek situation which was read by the President of the United States on Wednesday last at a joint session of the Congress. A choice between two pleasant courses of action was not afforded. I have decided to support the President's request. It occurs to me that it might be well if the titular leader of the Republican Party were to make his views known on this all-important question, since it goes without saying that he is a candidate for the nomination of his party for the Presidency of the United States; and since the step we are about to take is as important as any affecting our foreign policy we have ever taken in the Nation's history, I think it would be well if we could hear what the gentleman in Albany thinks about this matter. I know it would be of considerable interest to the Members of the Senate, to the Members of the House of Representatives, and to the people of the country.

PRIVATE BUSINESS PROFITS

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a table showing the incomes of corporations in the United States for various years, and a statement explaining the table. I merely wish to point out that about a year ago some misinformation was issued by the Department of Commerce, which indicated that a 30-percent increase in wages was possible without the need for a price increase. Of course, this was not possible. I think the Senate will find these factual figures on corporate profits very interesting.

There being no objection, the table and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE I.—Percent of profit earned by private business corporations in the United States on sales, total assets, and risk capital, 1931–46

[1] Estimate.

NOTE.—Figures were taken, without change or adjustment, from the annual volumes of Statistics of Income published by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, U. S. Government.

"Sales (compiled receipts)" comprise (1) taxable income consisting of gross sales (less returns and allowances), gross receipts from operations (where inventories are not an income-determining factor), taxable interest received, rents and royalties received, net capital gain, net gain from sale of property other than capital assets, dividends received from stock of domestic corporations, and other receipts required to be included in gross income, and (2) partially and wholly tax-exempt interest received on Government obligations. They exclude nontaxable income other than wholly tax-exempt interest received on certain Government obligations. The net effect of the broadening of the concept of "sales" to include the above-listed items, some of which are "net" items, is to show the percent of profit on sales in the attached tables to be slightly higher than was actually realized.

Net profit or loss comprises the amount remaining after all expenses of operation and all taxes have been deducted from "Sales (compiled receipts)."

"Shareholders capital" (synonymous with net worth and risk capital) consists of capital stock, common and preferred, surplus reserves, surplus and undivided profits less deficits.

"Dividends paid" comprise cash and all other types of dividends except corporation's own stock.

The corporations covered in these tables include all active private business corporations in the United States filing balance sheets in connection with their Federal income-tax returns. Of a total net profit of $12,200,869,000 reported for 1943 by all corporations filing Federal income-tax returns for that year, those submitting balance sheets with their income tax returns accounted for $12,181,000,000, or 99.84 percent.

The statistics in these tables, in going back to the year 1931, cover all the years for which complete data for each of the categories are available. Less complete records are available for a number of years prior to 1931.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the Members of the Senate were extremely courteous to me on Friday last in refraining from asking me to yield except when the circumstances were appropriate that they should so ask. I shall greatly appreciate, in the interest of continuity, their very kind cooperation again today. I shall not lay down any ironclad rule, as indicated on Friday, and shall yield in reasonable degree, but I think I can present the case much more clearly and better if I may be permitted to proceed with reasonable continuity.

At the time of the recess of the Senate on Friday last, following the synopsis of certain relevant portions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, of the Walsh-Healey Act, and of the Bacon-Davis Act, there had been presented, among other matters—

First. Information showing the great number of suits commonly called portal-to-portal cases which had within the 7 months ending January 31, 1947, been filed in the Federal courts; the fact that in 1,515 of the 1,913 such suits filed in those months, definite amounts aggregating $5,785,204,000 were claimed; that in the remaining 398 of the 1,913 suits a definite amount was not named, but the court was requested to give judgment for the amount found due; the fact that nearly 62 percent of the 1,913 suits were commenced during the month of January 1947; the fact that 1 or more of said 1,913 suits had been filed in 44 of the 48 States; the fact that the number, 1,913, is less than seven-twentieths of 1 percent of 557,030, which last-mentioned number is the estimated number of establishments covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act; that, according to a report of the subcommittee of the Business Advisory Council, Department of Commerce, dated January 20, 1947, the pending suits involved only 10 percent of the total number of employees subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act, and that the total number of employees subject to sections 6 and 7 of that act is roughly approximated at 20,150,000.

Second. The fact that the immediate cause of this vast and widespread litigation was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Anderson against Mount Clemens Pottery Co.

Third. The facts claimed demonstrate, in my opinion, that the activities which the Court held compensable in the Mount Clemens case were such as neither management nor labor had previously treated as or considered to be separately compensable.

Fourth. Facts, particularly those embraced in certain activities of CIO affiliates, showing how the influx of litigation occurred.

Fifth. Facts demonstrating certain of the effects of the mere institution and maintenance of these suits upon the companies sued, in some cases the working capital or net worth of the companies being less than the amounts for which they are sued, and the effects including impairment of financial position of defendants, retardation of industry, and burden of expense in preparation of defense of suits.

It had been pointed out that according to the subcommittee of the Business Advisory Council for the Department of Commerce:

> Whatever the final amounts which might be awarded by the courts if the present judicial interpretation stands, it is clear that the extent of litigation, the cost of defense, and the potential liabilities constitute such a burden on industry as to force many companies into bankruptcy and to disrupt seriously the whole economy.

Mr. President, today at the outset the attention of the Senate is directed not to the effect of the mere institution and maintenance of the suits, but to the further effect upon the companies sued in the event the suits shall be successful.

I refer first to the very important testimony of Mr. Wilson, who was mentioned on Friday last, the chairman of the board of governors of Aircraft Industries Association. Mr. Wilson testified, in substance, that pending suits against the 12 largest aircraft companies now total $461,000,000; that these amounts exceed the net current assets of these companies, which net current assets are $366,365,000, and that the amounts of the pending suits exceed the net worth of these companies, which net worth is $423,000,000. Thus it is, Mr. President, that in this great industry, the aircraft industry, the 12 largest companies are faced by suits in which the plaintiffs ask judgment for $38,000,000 more than the total net worth of the 12 largest aircraft companies.

I need not emphasize, save only to state the proposition, that the aircraft industry in our Nation bears a most important relationship to our national security and to our national defense.

Mr. Wilson also brought out a very interesting fact, almost an ironic fact, when he pointed to the unfairness of the pending suits in that the greater the production by the companies, which production was necessitated and occasioned by the war, the greater is their potential liability under the suits to which reference has been made.

Attention is also called not only to the tremendously precarious situation in which the aircraft industry now finds itself as a result of the maintenance of these portal-to-portal suits, but also to a similarly precarious situation in which the great lumber industry of the Pacific Northwest finds itself confronted at this time. In the testimony before the subcommittee it was asserted by Mr. James P. Rogers, executive secretary of the Western Woods Employers, that with a potential liability of $175,000,000 involving more than 1,000 companies it would be, as Mr. Rogers indicated, and substantially quoting him, "a bankrupting proceeding." His organization represents substantially all the Douglas-fir and western-pine industry of the Pacific Northwest, and that production comprises about one-third of the national lumber production. I quote a sentence from the testimony of Mr. Rogers:

> In addition, if we had to go on an 8-hour day—

I interpolate to say that with the double liability for overtime it is obvious that the whole tendency in this and other industries would be to restrict the time of the employment of laborers so as to bring their combined operations within the 40-hour week, thus escaping the time and a half.

> Mr. ROGERS. In addition, if we had to go on an 8-hour day, and assuming that we could survive these suits, the loss to the lumber production in the Pacific Northwest would be approximately 2,000,000,000 feet less logs each year if he had to go on an 8-hour day camp to camp, as we call it, and that would be a loss of about 95,000 houses that would not be built in the United States that will be built under the present system.

That is the tremendous impact of the litigation which materially threatens the production of lumber, and thereby materially interferes with the construction of houses for our population. I say to the general population and to the veterans of World War II that we had better stop, look, and listen before we pass by this extremely serious threat which now impends over us.

Not alone in the aircraft industry, not alone in the lumber industry, can striking illustrations be found, and were presented to our committee with respect to the terrific impact of this portal-to-poral litigation upon the industry of our country.

I refer next to the mining industries of our country. Mr. Julian D. Conover, secretary of the American Mining Congress, testified before the committee. I quote two sentences from his testimony:

> Pending and prospective claims for back pay for nonproductive activities, based on the Mt. Clemens decision, would not only wreck large segments of our industry, but in doing so would have grave consequences to the future economy and even the military security of our country. We believe it the duty of Congress, in the national interest, to take prompt and decisive action to end this threat.

A few moments ago I referred to the almost ironic situation which confronts the aircraft industries, in that the greater their production in response to the requirements of the Nation during the war, the greater their potential liability under this mass of litigation now pending against them. I call attention to another fact of equal interest, if not as of great financial importance. That is the fact that the Government itself, in carrying out a wise policy of internal security requirements, placed into effect regulations binding—if it was legally possible to bind them, and I have no doubt it was under the exigencies of war—the plants which were producing war materials, the effect of which regulations, in part, was to increase the amount of the so-called portal-to-portal liability. I call attention to one such regulation. It is found in pamphlet No. 32–2, dated September 1, 1943, entitled "Internal Security Inspection." It deals with the prevention of unauthorized entry to facilities. I quote this language from the regulation:

> Facilities engaged in war work of highest importance should be completely enclosed by a man-proof fence. The number of gates should be kept at a minimum.

Obviously, the requirement that the number of gates should be kept at a minimum would, if it had any effect whatever, result in increasing the amount of necessary walking time of some employees, for, of course, the smaller the number of gates the greater the probability of an increased distance between the gate and the actual place at which the employee was engaged in productive work. One gentleman who testified before the committee, Forrest J. Sanborn, was engaged in plant protection for the War Department during a portion of the war. He testified with respect to approximately 100 examinations which he made of plants in Wisconsin, Illinois, and Michigan, between April 1942 and January 1943, as follows:

Senator DONNELL. Of these 100 plants, what proportion, if you are able to recall, during April 1942 to 1943, were reduced by reason of this fencing, the number of entrances to the plant from what it had been prior to the installation of the fences to which you refer?

Mr. SANBORN. That is a hard one.

Senator DONNELL. Of course, you could not remember exactly, but could you tell us whether it was reduced to half, two-thirds, or one-fourth, or what?

Mr. SANBORN. I would say that one out of three plants probably reduced at least one to two exits, depending on the size of the plant, of course.

Subsequently in his testimony there occurred the following:

Senator DONNELL. Here is a plant which, prior to the putting in of the fencing around it, had, we will say, half a dozen entrances to which employees could come in and go to start their work at their machinery. After the installation of the fencing, what proportion of the plants, as nearly as you can recall, reduced the number of entrances from the half dozen, we will say, which they had into the plant originally to a smaller number of entrances into the fence?

Mr. SANBORN. I change my ratio to say at least half of them.

Senator DONNELL. In other words, you think that in at least half of the plants the number of entrances through the fence that was thrown around the plant was less than the number of entrances which the employees had been previously permitted to enter into the plant itself?

Mr. SANBORN. Yes, sir.

So, Mr. President, we find that these very security requirements, which were cheerfully complied with by the manufacturing interests of our country, in themselves have an obvious tendency toward very largely increasing the amount of the portal-to-portal liabilities for which effort is now being made to charge them.

Mention was made the other day of the fact that the effects of this litigation are not confined by any means to the large cities of our Nation. Among the witnesses to whom reference was made on Friday was Brig. Gen. Maurice Hirsch, of the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board. He pointed out with utmost clarity the fact that manufacturing for the war effort was not confined to the large cities. I have no doubt that my distinguished colleague from Missouri [Mr. KEM], who now presides over these deliberations, knows of the fact that in his and my State, in some of the smaller towns, such as Versailles, Jefferson City, and California, there were manufacturers of tents, leggings, and other materials. I had the pleasure of going through a part of one plant in a little town and seeing overcoat material being manufactured to be sent to far-off Russia. So throughout the Nation, Mr. President, in small towns and large towns, there was a distribution of the war effort. Manufacturers were not confined to the large cities. General Hirsch in his testimony points out that he knows of one instance in which a contractor had more than 25,000 subcontractors widely scattered. He mentioned also that one small contractor had 2,200 subcontractors, and to quote the general:

The prime contract did not amount to more than $3,000,000, I think.

Indeed, he very graphically uses this language in the course of his testimony, at page 749 of the hearings:

Our thumbtacks of concerns engaged in the war effort literally covered the country. It just absolutely flecked the entire map.

Senator DONNELL. Do you have any idea how many cities and towns there were in which there were Government contracts or subcontracts carried on?

General HIRSCH. I would say every city and town of any consequence and a tremendous number of villages.

Senator DONNELL. It would run into many thousands in which these contractors and subcontractors were located?

General HIRSCH. I know very few that were not engaged in war work.

Senator DONNELL. Your observation is that it would go back into the little town, the little city, where there is a grave uncertainty on the part of a subcontractor as to whether he is going to have to pay this portal to portal that would affect his plans for expansion and the labor he would employ, which would in turn affect the merchants, which would in turn affect the farmers and producers of all types and kinds?

General HIRSCH. That is true. We have already had occasions where they have closed up.

Senator DONNELL. It would affect the railroad carriers and so on?

General HIRSCH. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Including the carriers of interstate commerce?

General HIRSCH. That is the way I feel about it.

Obviously, Mr. President, with these suits being maintained, if any material portion of the 1,913 suits shall be successful, it is not at all unreasonable to expect that from one end of the country to the other, all over the Nation, in Federal courts and State courts, yes, even down to the smallest courts where the amounts involved are small, there will be a vast influx of litigation. We may expect also that employers and manufacturers who have now returned to a peacetime basis will find themselves confronted with claims involving vast sums which it will be impossible for them to pay. They will thereby, of course, be discouraged from, and in many instances prevented from, engaging in the expansion of their business which would normally occur. This would obviously affect workers in the respective communities who would not receive the employment which they would otherwise receive. It would affect the merchants who would otherwise have sold more merchandise because of the additional number of persons employed by the expanded industries. It would affect the farmers who would be producing commodities with which to feed a greater number of employees, including employees who would have had their wages advanced because of economic conditions incident to the expansion in the industries.

So, Mr. President, it is not at all an exaggeration to say that this ominous threat to our national economy goes clear down to the grass roots in the towns, villages, little cities, and even into the rural districts, in all branches of industry, and, to a greater or less degree it involves the prosperity of every individual in the United States.

I have in my hand a photostat copy of the New York Times of December 29, 1946, and I quote one paragraph from an article contained therein, which is headed "Billions involved."

In Michigan alone it is estimated that between 600,000 and 700,000 employees would be entitled to an average of $1,000 each, or about $600,000,000 to $700,000,000 of the estimated six to seven billions that may be eventually involved in the suits.

I have also in my hand a photostatic copy of an editorial from the New York Times of December 24, 1946, a portion of which I should like to read. It appears to be the first editorial of that date in the New York Times, and it reads as follows:

THE PORTAL-TO-PORTAL ISSUE

In 1941 the United Pottery Workers Industrial Union (CIO) instituted a suit for back pay on behalf of 1,100 employees against the Mount Clemens (Mich.) Pottery Co. The original basis of the suit was the claim that the company had failed to include certain bonus payments in the computation of the hourly rate for overtime; that it had failed to pay for a 15-minute lunch period; and that it had failed to pay for that part of the first quarter hour worked by employees arriving 2 or 3 minutes late. Federal Judge Frank A. Picard found in favor of the union, the following year only to be reversed by the circuit court of appeals. However, the union's claims were upheld by the Supreme Court in a decision handed down last June 10, since, declared the Court, "the statutory workweek includes all the time during which an employee is necessarily required to be on the employer's premises on duty or in a prescribed work place, the time spent in these activities must be properly compensated."

Says the editorial:

This decision has been seized upon by labor leaders as full recognition of the principle of portal-to-portal pay invoked by John L. Lewis during the war as a means of circumventing the Little Steel wage ceiling. It is now apparently to be used as a lever for one of the largest mass wage demands in the Nation's history. A fortnight ago representatives of the 800,000 members of the United Steelworkers of America—

I interpolate, Mr. President, that that is the CIO affiliate referred to on Friday last—filed suit against two subsidiaries of the United States Steel Corp. for $120,000,000 in back portal-to-portal pay (or, more accurately, in the case of a nonmining industry, gate-to-gate pay). But that was only the beginning of the movement, which is rapidly attaining the proportions of an avalanche. Predictions as to the ultimate amount of such claims are futile beyond the obvious conclusion that they seem destined to run into several billions.

Not millions, Mr. President, but billions.

The editorial continues:

These actions constitute a peculiarly disturbing and harassing type of wage demand, for a number of reasons. In the first place, wage contracts are ordinarily entered into with prevailing practices and working conditions in mind. To reopen such contracts, as this would in effect do, and to insert in them drastically retroactive provisions—

I pause at that point in the reading, Mr. President, to comment upon the corroboration by this editorial of my statement of last Friday as to the tremendous surprise which the rendition of this decision in the Mount Clemens case brought to the public at large.

Reverting again to the editorial:

which they were never intended to include, would be to impose severe and, in some cases, crippling penalties for acts which were, in many cases at least, entirely innocent. In the second place, the incidence of such penalties would be extremely capricious, being related not to the intent of the company concerned, but to the nature of the industry, on the one hand, and its geographical location on the other. In some instances "walking time" is a small item; in others a very considerable one. Moreover, the basis of claims depends upon the statute of limitations for such claims in the State of domicile of the corporation, and these range all the way from 6 months or a year to as long as 8 years.

All that remained to make this incredible picture complete was a touch of comedy relief, and the necessary bit of grim humor was supplied over the week end by Judge Picard, who rendered the original decision in the case. The issue of portal-to-portal pay, Judge Picard now declares, never entered into his findings. "That," says he, "was injected into the case by the Supreme Court." He had simply ruled that the union had just claims for back pay for overtime.

Mr. President, I now read the final short paragraph of this editorial:

This issue presents an urgent problem for the new Congress, and one that may not prove to be as simple as would appear on its face. The Wage and Hour Division apparently favors a uniform Federal statute which would at least determine the liabilities of industry and put them on more or less the same basis. But that might run into constitutional objections on the ground that it would apply retroactively to claims recognized by existing law. On one aspect of the problem, however, there can be no excuse for unnecessary delay. That is the clarification beyond any question of what constitutes working time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. In my reading of the bill I have come to section 9, paragraph (c) (1), on page 19; and I wish to ask the Senator whether that paragraph runs to things in addition to portal-to-portal matters.

Mr. DONNELL. Does the Senator from Massachusetts refer to the provision in regard to limitations?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. DONNELL. It does.

Mr. LODGE. It also seems to me that in section 8, paragraph (a) runs to things other than portal-to-portal matters.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. Then I should like to ask the Senator why the bill departs from the portal-to-portal field and goes into other subjects.

Mr. DONNELL. If the Senator from Massachusetts will be so kind, I should very much prefer to answer those questions when I reach the bill. They will be answered, and I hope they will be fully and satisfactorily answered; but I think it would disturb quite materially the presentation of this factual statement for me to discuss those matters at this time. So I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts will cooperate by not pressing his question at this moment.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, this country fortunately is not composed solely of large businesses. We have a vast number of small enterprises. Some of us now sitting in this body have been clerks in stores of small size, in small communities. It is somewhat refreshing and reassuring to observe from his testimony in behalf of the National Small Businessmen's Association that Mr. Arthur W. Kimball placed in the record a statement made by Mr. H. B. McCoy, of the Department of Commerce, before the Senate Small Business Committee, in 1942, 5 years or so ago. Mr. McCoy stated that in 1939, enterprises accounting for 97 percent of the total number of manufacturing establishments employing not more than 250 workers each, furnished jobs to 48 percent of all workers in the United States and accounted for 47 percent of the value of all production in manufacturing.

Mr. President, the reason for calling attention to the importance of small business in connection with this presentation is to make especial mention again of the fact that the impact of this portal-to-portal litigation is not confined to large companies, but goes down to the many small businesses, particularly the manufacturers, in the first instance, and thereafter the merchants and others to whom I have referred.

In addition to the testimony of General Hirsch that "thumbtacks of concerns engaged in the war effort literally covered the country," Mr. Wilson, of the Aircraft Industries, stated that the Army Air Forces estimated that more than 12,000 subcontractors worked on AAF contracts alone. Mr. President, the effect of this litigation upon small business, as well as upon large business, is clear and conclusive from the evidence of various witnesses before our committee.

Let me mention not only that great numbers of small enterprises participated in war production, but also that in so doing they expanded their operations far in excess of those in which they engaged in peacetime. Mr. President, you know, undoubtedly, as do I, of instances of small companies which in the course of the war became large companies producing vastly more than their wildest dreams or imagination would have caused them to expect in prior years. Likewise, with the conclusion of the war there came a resumption of the former peacetime activities, and in some cases doubtless less than ordinary previous peacetime volume. Inasmuch as the portal-to-portal liability asserted against such small companies would be based in part upon abnormally large operations engaged in during the war, the resultant claims against such companies would be out of all proportion to their probable peacetime capacity to pay. What then will be the effect? Suppose that judgments in such suits are rendered in the small towns of various sections of the country, perhaps in Connecticut. I observe that on my right sits a former Governor of the great State of Connecticut, and now a Member of this Body, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN]. Suppose in his State a large number of such judgments were rendered not only against the larger companies, but also against the smaller companies, based upon their wartime activities when they were producing more, and therefore increasing their portal-to-portal liabilities far in excess of what they would have been in peacetime. What then would be the effect on the economy of the towns and cities in which such companies were operating of the rendition of such judgments against those companies. The Senator from Connecticut was kind enough to tell of two companies which already had been forced to close their doors because of a provision in a Connecticut statute under which the institution of a suit gives the right to take attachment.

I venture to say that he would agree that with the rendition of judgment after judgment against subcontractors all over the United States, in the towns and cities and villages to which General Hirsch referred, the conditions of economic insecurity might mount to such a point and such proportions as to bring about in the United States vast financial panic as a result of this portal-to-portal litigation.

Mr. President, I have referred to a reported dated January 20, 1947, of a subcommittee of the Business Advisory Council for the Department of Commerce. Let me read a few observations from that report:

The problems faced by industrial concerns, of course, vary widely. Some small companies extended their employment vastly to engage in war work. Shrunk to prewar size, pay rolls, and resources, it is utterly impossible for these small concerns to meet the retroactive wage claims made against them. It is even impossible for them to hire enough clerical workers to examine the old-time cards and determine their potential liability. It is said on good authority that in the Northwest lumber industry only three concerns would remain solvent if presently filed claims became payable.

Mr. President, I pointed out that in the testimony given to us from the Northwest by Mr. James P. Rogers, of the Western Woods Employers, it was set forth that the potential liability asserted in these suits involves in excess of a thousand companies. Something of the magnitude of this tremendous and dangerous problem is indicated by the report of the Business Advisory Council, which states that it is said on good authority that in the Northwest lumber industry only three concerns out of at least a thousand, to quote again from Mr. Rogers, would remain solvent if presently filed claims become payable.

It may be asked, "Why cannot all the parties get together and settle these claims, and get them off the books?" Mr. President, there is a very good and very wholesome reason which has caused the Supreme Court of the United States to rule that it is impossible to compromise and settle these claims. I say that normally it is a good reason, and Senators will see later as the argument progresses our views with respect to that.

But what is the effect of the observation of the Supreme Court on the cases now at hand? It means that with $5,875,000,000 of liabilities asserted it is impossible for the employers and the employees to compromise and adjust the claims and get them off the books, with one possible exception. I say it is a possible exception because I am unable to determine from the case of Brooklyn Savings Bank v. O'Neal (324 U. S. 697), cited at page 182 of the record, whether there may be some cases where it is impossible for the persons to agree upon the facts, as to whether they might be able to enter into an agreement as to what are the facts. Nevertheless, it remains true that in the case of Brooklyn Savings Bank against O'Neal the Supreme Court held, in effect, that when the facts are once agreed upon, when it is found that so many hours have been put in by an employee, it is beyond the legal power of the employer and the employee to compromise or settle or adjust such a claim other than by the payment of 100 cents on the dollar. What is the reason for that? The reason is that the Supreme Court recognized that in passing the Fair Labor Standards Act the Congress had a very wholesome and salutary purpose, namely, the protection of interstate commerce from the burdens which would result to it were employees not to have the protections extended to them by the act. This is what the Court says:

> Neither petitioner nor respondent suggests that the right to the basic statutory minimum wage could be waived by any employee subject to the act. No one can doubt but that to allow waiver of statutory wages by agreement would nullify the purposes of the act. We are of the opinion that the same policy considerations which forbid waiver of basic minimum and overtime wages under the act also prohibit waiver of the employee's right to liquidate damages.

So, Mr. President, when an employee comes into court and says that he has worked 1 hour of overtime, for which he is normally paid 90 cents, a rate which is one and a half times his pay of 60 cents an hour, and files his claim for the 90 cents, and 90 cents more, an aggregate of $1.80, for that hour's work, under the Fair Labor Standards Act, when the facts are admitted as to how many hours he worked, under the decision of the Supreme Court he and the employer cannot validly compromise, settle, or adjust his claim.

The situation is such that unless Congress steps in and takes appropriate action, we will have this litigation pending until it shall have gone the gamut of the courts, the United States district courts, circuit courts of appeals, United States Supreme Court, and I have no doubt that as time shall progress, many suits will likewise be filed, from the standpoint of public convenience, in the State courts as well.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to suggest some of the facts—by no means all of them—which have been brought out in the testimony before and in the observations by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, as to the effect of this litigation on the defendants who are sued, and as to the effect on the total economy of the people of the United States. There is another effect which is perhaps of even greater consequence than many of the effects to which I have already referred. I allude now to the effect of the pending suits on the Federal Government itself.

Someone may ask, How is the Federal Government affected by this mass of litigation? It is affected in many ways. I shall mention the economic respects, at least the predominant economic respects, in which the Government is affected. I dare say, Mr. President, that just as when a pebble is thrown into a lake there follow waves and motions of the water extending over a wide area, so there may well be further effects upon the Government which will develop in addition to the economic effects to which I shall refer.

In the first place, suppose these suits are successfully maintained against any particular employers? If they are compelled to pay the judgments rendered against them in such suits, of course the very first thing they will think about, and properly so, is about coming back to the Federal Government and saying, "We have paid our income tax," and in some instances as excess-profits tax, "on the theory that our expenses were only so many dollars, but now we find that our liability is vastly greater than what we expected." Therefore they come to the Government with petitions for refunds of taxes which they have already paid. That is one obvious immediate effect which would occur from the rendition and payment of judgments against employers.

There is another result, Mr. President. Many of these employers, during the period from the time of the beginning of our participation in World War II, and doubtless even before that, in many instances, were war contractors. Suppose one of these war contractors is compelled to pay out in wages now, and in liquidated damages, and in expenses for the preparation of the suits, and in attorneys' fees to the plaintiffs, large sums of money which were not previously anticipated. Suppose the contractor held a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract from the Government, in other words, he was entitled to receive, first, his costs, plus a fixed fee for the rendition of the services performed. If a judgment should be rendered against such an employer and he were compelled to pay the judgment, what would he do? Obviously, the first thing he would do, in addition to thinking of his tax situation, would be to go to the Government and say, "My costs, under the contract which I carried out for the Government, were greater than I had anticipated, and under this contract I was entitled to my cost plus a fixed fee." Therefore he would file his claim against the Government for the increased cost over and above what he had anticipated previously.

A third effect may reasonably be expected. I shall mention all these somewhat more in detail in a few moments, but the third is that, even though in many cases there may be no legal liability on the part of the Government, in the case of contracts of a type different from the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee variety, or even a somewhat analogous type, a contract with an escalation clause, high Government officials appearing before our committee recognized in unmistakable terms the existence in their minds of at least moral claims, or at least they recognized that some might think they had moral claims for the settlement of which they would ask Congress to make provision.

So, on the one hand, we have the matter of the tax refunds, and, second, the case of employers who were war contractors, who had contracts with provision for cost plus fixed fees, or escalation clauses, who would be entitled as a matter of law to reimbursement to the full amount of the claims they might legally pay. In the third place, there are those situations—many of them, as we shall see in a few moments—in which liability may be asserted against the Government.

Then there is a fourth class of cases, those in which a man has performed contracts for the Government, but has not yet completed his renegotiation with the Government. There are only about 518 such cases still unrenegotiated, but the amounts involved in those cases aggregate, as I recall, approximately $6,000,000,000 in gross amounts of the contracts.

Suppose that these men, when they come before the renegotiation authorities, say "You are now trying to find out whether we made too much money in performing our contracts. We call to your attention the fact that our costs were vastly more than we thought they were going to be, because portal-to-portal judgments have been secured against us. We therefore request the Government not to require us to pay back to the Government amounts of renegotiated recoveries, which would have been properly chargeable against us, had not these additional costs developed." I shall have something to say with respect to that situation in a moment.

We had before our committee Under Secretary of War Royall. He gave most interesting and valuable testimony. In the first place, he pointed out that the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts entered into with the War Department totaled between forty and forty-five billion dollars. He estimated that about $11,000,000,000, or 25 percent of the total amount, represented the cost of direct labor in those contracts. He agreed in his testimony that the maximum liability on the part of the Government, based on such contracts, would be between approximately $1,210,000,000 and $1,430,000,000. I mean, Mr. President, the maximum liability on the part of the Government for reimbursement on account of portal-to-portal activities could run between approximately $1,210,000,000 and $1,430,000,000, according to the testimony of Under Secretary Royall.

The Under Secretary, however, testified in substance that while it is entirely possible that the amounts might aggregate these figures, in the first place, he did not think the amounts would be in excess of between four hundred and five hundred million dollars on the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts. But the seriousness of the situation is strikingly evidenced by the fact that within a few days after the Under Secretary of War had appeared before our committee, he revised his estimate as to a possible liability of between four hundred to five hundred million dollars and increased it to a sum in excess of $600,000,000. In other words, within a very few days, conditions had changed to such an extent that the Under Secretary of War became convinced that there was a potential liability of the War Department, on cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts, of over $600,000,000. I shall read a very few words of the Under Secretary. He wrote me to this effect:

When I testified before your subcommittee, I stated that claims had been asserted against War Department cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contractors in this class of case in the approximate amount of $200,000,000. When I subsequently testified before a subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary I stated that that figure of reported claims had increased to approximately $280,000,000, further indicating the practical impossibility of attempting to give actual figures. Evaluating the situation as best we can, however, I stated that it seems reasonable to conclude that the amount of these claims asserted against cost type contractors might reach four hundred to five hundred million dollars.

The concluding sentence of this quotation from the Under Secretary reads:

In the past few days, and as of February 12, 30 newly reported cases of the type considered herein have increased the amounts claimed in this type of case to an amount now in excess of $600,000,000.

I might digress for a moment to call attention to the fact that on February 8, 1947, Judge Picard had dismissed the Mount Clemens case. And yet "In the past few days," says General Royall, "and as of February 12"—which was 4 days after the dismissal—"30 newly reported cases of the type considered herein have increased the amounts claimed in this type of case to an amount now in excess of $600,000,000."

Mr. President, I do not know whether those 30 new claims were some that had come in after Judge Picard's decision; I am not informed as to that fact. I shall demonstrate in a few moments, I think, the fact that Judge Picard's decision by no means makes unnecessary or inadvisable the enactment of legislation on this grave problem at this time.

The very fact that, writing under date of February 14, 6 days after Judge Picard's decision, Mr. Royall did not indicate that, in his judgment, the amounts involved in the claims would decline; but on the other hand, pointed out that they had risen to a point where they might reach in excess of six hundred million dollars, as compared to an estimate of between four hundred and five hundred millions, on the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts, as mentioned in his earlier testimony, certainly indicates that the Under Secretary does not regard the decision of Judge Picard as by any means decisive of the liability of the War Department in this class of cases.

We thus find the figure of $600,000,000 estimated by Under Secretary Royall, with a possible maximum liability of from $1,210,000,000 to $1,430,000,000 against the War Department, on the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts.

We had before us, also, Mr. W. John Kenney, Assistant Secretary of the Navy. Without going into the details of his testimony, he pointed out that the potential liability of the Navy Department on the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts would be approximately $720,000,000; on the escalation contracts, approximately $180,000,000; and there is an indeterminate amount on the 518 nonrenegotiated cases, to which I referred a few moments ago, the aggregate amount to which the 518 cases extend the entire gross contract figur s being $6,821,843,000.

Mr. President, we thus have in the Navy Department two figures of $720,000,000 and $180,000,000, making $900,000,000 of potential liability, in addition to an indeterminate amount on nonrenegotiated cases, which are not small cases, obviously, because of the fact that they involve in excess of $6,800,000,000 of gross contract figures.

The Maritime Commission is also confronted with a similar situation. Mr. W. W. Smith, chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, under date of February 5, 1947, wrote the committee a letter from which I read a few words:

Liability would doubtless arise to the greatest extent under the Commission's ship construction contracts. To a lesser degree liability would be involved under ship repair contracts, stevedoring contracts, terminal contracts, and miscellaneous other contracts of a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee nature. As a rough estimate, potential liability under these contracts might fall somewhere between 50 million and 150 million dollars. These high and low figures represent, however, merely an informative guess and are exclusive of any administrative expense that would undoubtedly be imposed on the Commission in connection with determining liability to employees and making reimbursements in the event of liability.

These figures are also exclusive of attorney's fees both for the plaintiffs, as provided by the Fair Labor Standards Act, and for defense of the suits.

He concludes this paragraph with this significant sentence:

These expenses would be tremendous.

Then he says, in the next paragraph, just one sentence:

Generally speaking, the same problems will confront the Commission as a result of the portal-to-portal pay claims as those concerning which the subcommittee has already received testimony from other Government departments.

Mr. President, there was one very significant thing which our committee overlooked. That was the situation in which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation finds itself in view of portal-to-portal litigation. I have in my hand a letter, together with a tabulation. I am going to read the letter and to ask leave to incorporate it and the tabulation in the RECORD in a moment. The letter is on the letterhead of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Washington 25, D. C. Up in the corner is the name James L. Dougherty, general counsel. The letter is signed by him. It is dated March 11, 1947, and addressed to myself. It says:

In response to the telephone inquiry made in your behalf by Mr. Kammerman, I am enclosing a summary statement of the estimated contingent liability of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to contractors and agents for portal-to-portal payments pursuant to the Fair Labor Standards Act, as interpreted by the Supreme Court. The statement includes the assumptions and computations which form the basis for our estimates. I am sure you will appreciate that these estimates can be little more than an informed guess because of the vast number of uncertainties and unknowns surrounding the possibilities and extent of portal-to-portal recovery.

No claims have been asserted against the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for portal-to-portal payments under the Walsh-Healey Act or the Davis-Bacon Act, and we do not anticipate any liability under either of those acts.

If you wish any additional information, please do not hesitate to let us know.

Sincerely,

JAMES L. DOUGHERTY,
General Counsel.

Mr. President, the summary statement to which Mr. Dougherty refers is rather extensive, and I shall not read it all here, but I should like to read a little of it. It starts in this way:

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Estimated contingent liability for additional wages to employees of contractors and agents for portal-to-portal time under recent Supreme Court interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. All amounts are stated in millions of dollars.

The first item is under the heading of Office of Defense Supplies. The tabulation shows that purchases under cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts aggregate $9,900,000; plant operations, $1,900,000; subsidies, $300,000; total $12,100,000.

Office of Metals Reserve, the total carried out in the far column is $16,000,000.

Office of Defense Plants, $141,700,000.

Making a total, Mr. President, as I understand, of the estimated contingent liability for additional wages to employees of contractors and agents for portal-to-portal time under recent Supreme Court interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as found by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in its own words, of $231,900,000.

Then, Mr. President, I call attention to this further language in a note marked "Important."

The figures shown in this statement represent only the compensation payable at the rate of time and a half for the uncompensated overtime. The Fair Labor Standards Act requires that an amount equal to the amount of unpaid compensation shall be added to the recovery as liquidated damages and, if it is determined that under its contracts this Corporation is required to reimburse its contractors not only for the unpaid compensation but also for the liquidated damages, each figure should be doubled.

In other words, instead of the liability of $231,900,000 there would be a liability of $463,800,000 by the RFC.

Mr. President, we have already seen that the recapitulation of potential legal liability—and I am talking now of legal liability as distinguished from moral liability—is in the case of the Army $600,000,000; the Navy $900,000,000; the Maritime Commission, we will say, $100,000,000, as an average between $50,000,000 and $150,000,000, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation $463,800,000, making a total of $2,063,800,000, plus in the case of the Army sufficient to bring its liability up to $1,420,000,000 as an outside figure, making an aggregate possible potential legal liability, according to the best judgment of the men who testified before us, and including the Reconstruction Finance Corporation letter, an estimated total liability of the Government of $2,893,800,000.

Mr. President, I do not want to be unfair in this matter. I want to recall the fact that Secretary Royall does not expect the liability of the War Department to go to either $1,210,000,000 or $1,430,000,000. He expects it to be only in the neighborhood, as I understand, of an amount in excess of $600,000,000, but if the larger amount be not taken, there is still a potential liability from the portal-to-portal suits upon these four departments of the Government, the Army, the Navy, the Maritime Commission, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in the sum of $2,063,800,000.

Mr. President, I now request that there be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks on this point the letter of March 11, 1947, from Mr. James L. Dougherty, General Counsel of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the summary statement to which he refers, and from which I have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter and summary statement are as follows:

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION,
Washington, D. C., March 11, 1947.

Hon. FORREST C. DONNELL,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR DONNELL: In response to the telephone inquiry made in your behalf by Mr. Camerman, I am enclosing a summary statement of the estimated contingent liability of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to contractors and agents for "portal-to-portal" payments pursuant to the Fair Labor Standards Act, as interpreted by the Supreme Court. The statement includes the assumptions and computations which form the basis for our estimates. I am sure you will appreciate that these estimates can be little more than an informal guess because of the vast number of uncertainties and unknowns surrounding the possibilities and extent of portal-to-portal recovery.

No claims have been asserted against the RFC for portal-to-portal payments under the Walsh-Healy Act or the Davis-Bacon Act, and we do not anticipate any liability under either of those acts.

If you wish any additional information please do not hesitate to let us know.

Sincerely,

JAMES L. DOUGHERTY,
General Counsel.

Reconstruction Finance Corporation.—Estimated contingent liability for additional wages to employees of contractors and agents for portal-to-portal time under recent Supreme Court interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. All amounts are stated in millions of dollars

Office of—	Construction, cost plus fixed-fee contracts	Purchases, cost plus fixed-fee contracts	Plant operations	Service contracts containing wage escalator clauses	Subsidies	Total
Defense Supplies	-------	[1] $9.9	[2] $1.9	------	[3] $0.3	*$12.1
Metals Reserve	-------	-------	[4] 1.9	[5] $2.7	[6] 11.4	*16.0
Rubber Reserve	[7] $41.7	-------	[8] 20.0	[9] .4	------	*62.1
Defense Plants	[10] 128.2	-------	[11] 13.5	------	------	*141.7
Total	169.9	9.9	37.3	3.1	11.7	*231.9

NOTES—(1) The figures shown in this estimate cover the entire period of operation, construction, purchases, etc., and, consequently, where such period is in excess of the time prescribed by the applicable State statute of limitations, the amount shown in this estimate will be to that extent reduced.

*Important: (2) The figures shown in this estimate represent only the compensation payable at the rate of time and a half for the uncompensated overtime. The Fair Labor Standards Act requires that an amount equal to the amount of unpaid compensation shall be added to the recovery as liquidated damages and, if it is determined that under its contracts this Corporation is required to reimburse its contractors not only for the unpaid compensation but also for the liquidated damages, each figure should be doubled.

(3) A 10-percent factor was applied to estimated labor costs in computing the foregoing amounts. The 10-percent factor was arrived at on the assumption that 30 additional minutes per day would be claimed (15 minutes in the morning and 15 minutes at night) plus 15 minutes per day to compensate for time and one-half and double time. (45 minutes portal-to-portal pay equals about 10-percent of an 8-hour day.)

[1] Labor costs estimated to be: 4 percent of $10,700,000 expended for carbon black; 10 percent of $919,000,000 expended for alcohol (including high wines, dehydrated potatoes and molasses); $11,900,000 for hydrogenation of raw feed stocks, and $3,519,000 for rubber thread and elastic web and braid; 70 percent of $5,800,000 on the jewel-bearings program; 75 percent of $3,500,000 expended on petroleum coke.

[2] Labor costs estimated to be: 35 percent of $12,700,000 pipe-line operating costs; 5/10 percent of $98,900,000 expended in connection with the operation of aviation gasoline plants.

[3] Labor costs estimated to be 1/3 of $8,300,000 expended on the aluminum program.

[4] Where actual labor costs were not available, estimates were based on 40 to 60 percent of total contract costs, varying with circumstances of each particular case.

[5] Labor costs with respect to metals treatment contracts estimated to be 40 percent of $62,177,000 expended whereas labor costs were estimated to be 80 percent of about $2,400,000 expended for stevedoring and warehousing.

[6] It is believed we have no contingent liability under the premium price plan on copper, lead, and zinc although it has been the policy to compensate operators, through increased quotas, for retroactive wage increases.

[7] Based on 60 percent of $695,000,000 expended for construction of synthetic rubber plants.

[8] Labor costs estimated to be: 100 percent of direct labor costs, $64,100,000; 80 percent of plant overhead ($122,700,000), $98,200,000; 60 percent of repairs ($62,800,000), $37,700,000.

[9] Direct labor costs on contracts with: (a) Latex agents determined to be $700,000; (b) scrap-rubber agents determined to be $2,500,000.

[10] The labor involved in this question is divided into 2 categories: (a) The labor authorized by the plancor leases, such as cost-plus-fixed-fee lump sum, labor supply contracts, etc., and designated as plancor labor; and (b) labor authorized by plant clearance contracts, close down and other related work and known as reconversion labor.

Category (a): From Factual Appendices A where they were complete and from the monthly status report DP-4 where the factuals were incomplete; data were assembled by schedules I, Land improvements; schedule II, Construction; and schedule III, Machinery and equipment, portable tools and automotive equipment. By applying the total of the schedules to the total costs, definite percentages were arrived at which indicate that schedule I represents 2 percent of the total cost of all plancors; schedule II, 37 percent; and schedule III, 61 percent. Total disbursements as of Oct. 31, 1946, amount to $7,200,000,000. To this figure was added $41,000,000 representing commitments to complete the work to Dec. 31, 1946. From the sum of these 2 figures the cost of the plancors transferred to the Office of Rubber Reserve was deducted leaving a net cost of the plancors as of Dec. 31, 1946, of $6,583,700,000. By using the percentages above referred to, we arrive at a cost of all the plancors by schedule as of Dec. 31, 1946. These costs are schedule I, $131,700,000; schedule II, $2,436,000,000; schedule III, $4,016,000,000.

Under schedule I we made the assumption that 25 percent of the total costs would represent average labor costs. Likewise under schedule II, Construction, 50 percent is assumed to represent average labor costs in that schedule and 10 percent is again assumed to represent the average labor costs in schedule III.

The labor as represented by applying the percentagr to the total of schedule II includes cost-plus-fixed-fee, lump sum, labor supply, and lessee's labor supply undee service costs and at this time we are unable to separate the several types of labor; however, in our opinion, if portal-to-portal pay is a liability for cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts, it would apply equally well to lump-sum contracts in that the majority of lump-sum contracts contain the conditions on which the price was based, e. g., the 40-hour week, etc. However, a deduction has been made for lump-sum contracts which is considered further on. It is well to bring out the fact that the labor represented by schedule II is predominantly A. F. of L., estimated at 95 percent or even higher. Inasmuch as the construction contracts were based on the rules and regulations of the unions representing the A. F. of L. which included many concessions, such as, expenses to and from the work, etc., it is debatable whether portal-to-portal pay could be granted under such union contracts.

Conversely the labor represented by schedule III as 10 percent of the total cost of such schedule is predominantly CIO and represents installations by the lessee's employees of the machinery and equipment and it is presumed that this labor would have the best chance of securing the portal-to-portal pay.

Combining the amounts of labor which have been discussed above, we arrive at the following:

	Schedule costs	Estimated average percent of labor	Total labor costs by schedule
Schedule I	$131,700,000	25	$32,900,000
Schedule II	2,436,000,000	50	1,216,100,000
Schedule III	4,016,000,000	10	401,600,000
Total	6,583,700,000	-------	1,650,600,000

From our knowledge of construction contracts made in different sections of the country, we have determined that 75 percent of all construction work was performed under cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts. Accordingly, we have reduced the figure above representing total labor costs by 25 percent resulting in an amount of $1,238,000,000 for plancor labor mentioned in category (a) in the second paragraph.

Category (b): The labor costs on plant clearance amounts to about $46,700,000 and for close down $11,900,000. From this total we again deduct an amount of 25 percent representing lump-sum contracts, resulting in a total labor cost for category (b) in the amount of $43,950,000.

Consideration was given to the standard escalator clause which was incorporated in purchase orders to provide for increases permissible under OPA regulations. Such escalator clause provides that an approval of a 15 percent increase could be given by our field representatives prior to delivery of the equipment, and, where the increase is over 15 percent, such approval requires consideration by the Board. Presumably all such increases have been made. Therefore, it is our opinion that the proposed portal-to-portal increases in pay would have no effect on the escalator clause and therefore no attempt was made to separate such purchase orders. It is believed that at least 98 percent of our purchase orders contained a firm price and would not be affected by the portal-to-portal claim.

The sum of categories (a) and (b) amounting to $1,281,950,000 represents the sum on which any portal-to-portal pay case may be based.

SUMMARY

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I referred a little while ago to the fact that there is something more than even this legal liability. I have been talking thus far about legal liability on the part of the Government. I want to read in this connection statements which I think are far more persuasive than any argument I might make about it. I refer to statements made by Under Secretary Royall, certain statements made by Mr. Kenney, of the Navy Department, and by General Hirsch. I quote from page 413 of the hearings from the testimony of Secretary Royall. He said:

There would be very many situations where there was no legal right to reimbursement by the Government but where in fairness there ought to be an adjustment.

Mr. President, obviously the Under Secretary had in mind the case in which a man has carried out his Government contract in good faith, patriotically and loyally, and did not, however, have a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract. Therefore, legally speaking, he would have no claim upon the Government for reimbursement of the excess amount which he had been required to pay under the portal-to-portal case against him. Yet he would have been required to pay it. He might go into bankruptcy if he did have to pay it.

Secretary Royall obviously recognized the fact that a very strong point, a very convincing contention could be made by this class of contractors of a moral liability on the part of the Government to pay this additional expense which was in good faith, honestly incurred by the contractor. So, Mr. Royall testified to the extent that I read a moment ago. Then he further said:

But I feel very strongly that there is a great equity—

in favor of a contractor who made a settlement or adjusted his price or entered into a renegotiation without taking into account the portal-to-portal pay, because he did not know about it. I think there is great equity in his favor.

I digress to comment not merely upon the language of the Under Secretary, but also upon the significent corroboration which his language gives to the argument I made on Friday, to the effect that our Nation—both employees and employers—was confronted by surprise in the Mt. Clemens decision and the doctrine therein enunciated. Here the Under Secretary has pointed out the case of a contractor who had made settlements with the Government "without taking into account the portal-to-portal pay, because he did not know about it." He says, as I have indicated, "I think there is great equity in his favor."

Under Secretary Royall made further comments along these lines at page 421 of the record:

Senator DONNELL. It is at least entirely possible, is it not, Mr. Secretary, that advocates of the respective contractors asserting moral liability might, in the first place, assert that they are entitled to a legal liability, and in the second place fall back upon the moral liability and assert such liability in a much larger sum, indeed, than would be characterized by a legal liability?

Mr. ROYALL. Oh, yes, sir; I think that is true.

Senator DONNELL. Yes, sir. And you are not able, and I do not want to ask you to express an opinion if you are not, to state even approximately how many dollars of alleged moral liability would be asserted by contractors?

Mr. ROYALL. It would depend entirely on the standard of moral liability we fixed. If we took the renegotiation cases, the escalator-clause cases, the periodic price adjustment cases, it would be considerably less than that on portal-to-portal payments of $140,000,000,000 worth of contracts, but how much less I do not know because we have not made that analysis.

It would be foolish to make it until we knew what sort of a moral liability was to be permitted.

Senator DONNELL. And, Mr. Secretary, can you tell us approximately the entire amount of the first amount of contracts? Not the possible liability, but the first amount of the contracts comparable with the $40,000,000,000 to $45,000,000,000 figure of the total amount of contracts upon which the contracts might be asserted, in your judgment, to have either moral or legal liability which would exist on the part of the Government?

Mr. ROYALL. The total amount of supply contracts of the Government from 1941 to 1946, inclusive.

I digress to state that obviously what Mr. Royall was saying was that these claims or moral liability would apply not only to the $40,000,000,000 to $45,000,000,000 of cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts to which I referred a little while ago, with respect to which the figure of $600,000,000, or possibly even as much as $1,400,000,000 of potential liability might apply. He is pointing out that when we get into the question of moral liability, there can be asserted a liability upon contracts involving approximately three times the amount of contractual liability involved in these vast figures, on which potential legal liability is predicated.

Continuing with the quotation, Mr. Royall had just said:

The total amount of supply contracts of the Government from 1941 to 1946, inclusive.

That is to say, he meant the total amount of supply contracts with respect to which the claim of moral liability could be asserted.

Senator DONNELL. This is just the War Department?

Mr. ROYALL. I mean the War Department. I am sorry.

Senator DONNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROYALL. That is $132,000,000,000.

Senator DONNELL. $132,000,000,000?

Mr. ROYALL. And the total amount of the construction contracts of the War Department during that same period is something in excess of $11,000,000,000, making a total of between $143,000,000,000 and $144,000,000,000.

Senator DONNELL. Yes, sir.

Now, are there any contractors in any other category than those you have mentioned; namely, the cases aggregating $143,000,000,000 to $144,000,000,000 as to which, in your judgment, either a legal or moral liability might be reasonably asserted?

Mr. ROYALL. I think that would include them all, and, of course, as to some of those, there might be no portal-to-portal pay at all.

Senator CAPEHART. That is, plus the $40,000,000,000 to $45,000,000,000?

Mr. ROYALL. No. The $40,000,000,000 to $45,000,000,000 is included in the $144,000,000,000.

Senator DONNELL. Yes, sir.

It may be somewhat difficult, hearing this excerpt from the testimony without the benefit of the continuity of the testimony, to understand it adequately. However, as I interpret it—and I think my interpretation is correct—the gist of it is that Secretary Royall was giving figures with respect to legal liability in connection with portal-to-portal cases, based upon contracts aggregating between $40,000,000,000 and $45,000,000,000 gross amounts, but he points out that the moral liability would exist with respect to approximately $145,000,000,000 more of contracts, namely, the $40,000,000,000 to $45,000,000,000 to which I have referred, plus an additional $100,000,000,000. Obviously, when we come to figures of that kind and confront the moral liability question, we arrive at sums which are beyond comprehension and beyond adequate estimation. Yet they must be reckoned with, because if contractors all over the country are required to pay thousands upon thousands of small subcontractors in the little town in which this man lives or that man lives, we shall find them coming before Congress with equities in their favor, requesting not merely the total of the legally claimable sums, but the morally claimable sums.

Under Secretary Royall was not the only individual testifying before us who indicated that a moral liability might exist. He recognized the validity of the moral liability argument. It may have no validity, but obviously the Under Secretary thought it ought to be taken into consideration. We shall find in a moment that the Under Secretary of the Navy and the former chairman of the Renegotiation Board, General Hirsch, likewise thought these alleged moral liabilities should be taken into consideration in determining the impact of this vast amount of portal-to-portal legislation upon our Nation.

This is an excerpt from the testimony of the Under Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Kenney:

Senator DONNELL. Yes, sir. Taking a case, however, of a contractor who has settled his contract and thus is legally without further remedy, but that it now develops that in fact his labor costs were 10 percent greater because of the portal-to-portal item, greater than he had anticipated, or the Government had anticipated, you and I would readily concede, at least from the standpoint of the contractor, that he has made a poor bargain in settling his contract and might have some moral claim?

Mr. KENNEY. I do not think there is any doubt of that, Mr. Chairman.

Senator DONNELL. That is to say, Congress would be easily justified in considering that even though the man be barred as a matter of law, that he might have some right to an equitable cause on the part of Congress in making an endeavor to give relief to him. You would agree with that, would you not?

Mr. KENNEY. I would agree with that view, Mr. Chairman, because there is no doubt that the contracts were settled on that basis, without regard to possible portal-to-portal pay liability.

There sits this afternoon in the chair of the majority leader the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] who was present at a number of the hearings before the subcommittee. He made a very great contribution in the questions which he asked of General Hirsch which I shall read in a moment.

It will be remembered that General Hirsch was the man who presided as chairman over the board which renegotiated vast numbers of contracts.

He stated that—

Now, the gross renegotiation recoveries of all Departments conducting renegotiation have amounted to up to and inclusive of 31 December 1946, $10,086,058,000. And, incidentally, all of my figures are as of that date.

Then follows this colloquy between him and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]:

General HIRSCH. * * * Now, we have no means of knowing to what extent that will apply across the board, but until we determine that, there is certainly a possibility that the portal-to-portal claims will completely eliminate, if you allow it to eliminate, the total amount of excessive profits that our activity has achieved during the whole course of the war.

Senator CAPEHART. In other words, this $3,000,000,000 that you have already saved for the taxpayers may be wiped out?

General HIRSCH. There is a possibility that that may be eliminated completely.

Senator CAPEHART. It may be completely eliminated?

General HIRSCH. Right.

So, Mr. President, we can see something of the vastness of the possible liability of the Government under these portal-to-portal claims, both with respect to legal liability and to the possible moral liability which may be asserted.

On Friday I read from a statement of a law firm in St. Louis with respect to the burden of making the accountings necessary to be made in order to ascertain, in the case of a given company, the amount owing by it under the portal-to-portal theory to its employees. It might be thought that inasmuch as this firm of lawyers is counsel for the firm to which it referred, there may be some partiality on its part, and that there should be, therefore, some discount as to the correctness of the statement. Let me quote, however, from the observations of Mr. Kenney, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, in a letter dated February 11, 1947, in referring to what he terms the tremendous expense and administrative burden which would be entailed in reassembling and reviewing pay-roll records and supporting data in order to compute the amount of recovery to be paid under the portal-to-portal doctrine. Said Mr. Kenney, at page 633 of the testimony:

This expense, which would generally be reimbursable—

That is to say, Mr. President, reimbursable by the Government to the contractor—to the same extent as the actual recoveries made by employees, could well equal in many cases the aggregate of the portal-to-portal claims themselves.

I referred, Mr. President, earlier this afternoon, not alone to the recoveries that may be made from the Government under the cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts, escalator contracts, and so forth, but also to the subject of potential tax losses which the Treasury of the United States may suffer from the payment of portal-to-portal claims asserted by employees.

I do not wish to leave the impression that any given employer could recover both the extra amount of wages which he has to pay under the portal-to-portal doctrine and also recover on account of the same additional expenditure a refund on taxes. But, Mr. President, there are many cases, undoubtedly, in which corporations would not be able to make any recoveries at all from the Government as reimbursement on cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts, for the reason that in many cases the portal-to-portal activities would have occurred other than under war contracts—in other words, in situations in which the employer had no contract for reimbursement by the Government.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JENNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. I am trying to straighten out in my own mind one matter as to which I probably agree with the Senator. In connection with portal-to-portal pay, the Senator discussed the question of how much work was done for the benefit of the contract, or how much time was consumed in performing it. The portal-to-portal question involves both of those elements. Sometimes an employer requires an employee to do certain work preliminary to starting his day's work. In defining the portal-to-portal question, is the Senator including the portal-to-portal preliminary work required by an employer to be done before the day's work starts, such as sharpening tools or cleaning up around the work bench, or things of that kind?

Mr. DONNELL. I presume that the Senator was not in the Chamber at the moment when I began my discussion. With his permission, I should like to defer the discussion of that matter until I come to the actual discussion of the bill. At that time I shall certainly take his question into account. If I do not do so adequately, I trust that the Senator will renew his question.

Mr. President, on the subject of potential tax losses which the Treasury of the United States may suffer from the payment of portal-to-portal claims asserted by employees, the committee had the benefit of the testimony of Mr. John P. Wenchel, chief counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and of others in his office. At the commencement of his testimony Mr. Wenchel stated:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my appearance before you is on behalf of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. My statement and remarks in relation to the matter of portal-to-portal wages you have under consideration will have to do briefly with the allowances, which must be made by way of deduction from the taxable incomes of taxpayers in respect of the amounts that are paid by them on account of retroactive wages and liquidated damages under the decision in the case of the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. in computing their Federal income- and excess-profits-tax liabilities, and with a rough estimate of the impact this may have on the Federal revenues collected by the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

The employers of the country have made many inquiries of us as to the taxable year or years for which the payments they make will be allowable by the Bureau as deductions in determining their tax liabilities.

With respect to the year or years to which deductions for portal-to-portal claims paid by employers may be attributed in determining the tax liabilities of such employers, Mr. Wenchel stated that in January 1947 the Bureau had made the following ruling:

Taxpayers may be permitted to allocate the amounts of overtime pay and liquidated damages for prior taxable years necessitated by the decision in Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., supra, to the year or years in which the services to which such payments relate were rendered.

In selecting the manufacturing industries as those primarily concerned with the taxes under discussion, Mr. Wenchel gave estimates of taxes on portal-to-portal payments in respect to three groups in industry. First, he selected employers having no tax liability; second, employers with income-tax liability only; third, employers having both income-tax liability and excess-profits-tax liability. He stated that in the first case, namely, the class of employers having no tax liability, the employers—will not benefit tax wise from the added pay roll, nor will the Government suffer any tax loss, except insofar as any adjustments which may possibly be effective as carry-overs against possible profit in future years.

Then, testifying further—in this case, as to the tax adjustments necessitated by portal-to-portal payments—Mr. Wenchel said:

By giving effect to the various tax rates and the distribution of employers among the three classes distinguished above, it is estimated that for each dollar of wage adjustment spread evenly over the open statute period, 1943–47, the over-all tax consequence is 60 cents. Under the same circumstances, the estimated tax consequence of each dollar of wage adjustment spread over the entire period to which the adjustments are applicable, 1938–47, is 48 cents. If the entire wage adjustment is concentrated in 1947, the effect would be approximately 37 cents on each dollar.

This estimate does not take into account prior effects of the present relief provisions relating to tax adjustments which have already been made or which will be made prior to the wage adjustments in respect to carry-backs, respread of amortization, and relief claims under section 722. Downward adjustments in tax resulting from these provisions will necessarily lower the effective rates of 60, 48, and 37 cents, respectively. It is not possible at this time to make an estimate in respect to this feature of the problem.

The tax consequences relating to the employees due to the additional income received by them are, in general, 17 cents for each $1 of wage adjustment.

Mr. President, the committee's conclusion in respect to the preceding is as follows:

From the estimates of Mr. Wenchel we think it reasonable to conclude that (a) the aggregate of employers who are permitted to spread over the years 1943–47 portal-to-portal claims paid by them will recover from the Treasury, by way of adjustment on their tax liability, an over-all sum of 60 cents on each $1 of portal-to-portal claims paid by them, and (b) the aggregate of employees receiving such payments, if the entire payments should be made in the year 1947, will be required to pay, as income tax to the Treasury, 17 cents of each $1 received by them in portal-to-portal payments. In such a case, the net loss in tax adjustments to the Treasury would be 43 cents on each $1 of portal-to-portal payments.

I have frequently referred to the Business Advisory Council for the Department of Commerce. I wish to close this discussion of the tax situation and of expenditures by the Federal Government which would be necessitated by the portal-to-portal claims, if permitted to be maintained, with this succinct statement by the Business Advisory Council of the Department of Commerce, dated January 20, 1947, as follows:

While the plight of the armed services and the Treasury is not a direct responsibility of industry, it is a matter of high concern to any citizen. The economic stability of the Nation is closely woven into fiscal policy, Government expenditures, and taxation. Even if a moderate percentage of potential portal-to-portal claims become payable, the tax revenues of the Federal Government would decline very sharply and appropriations would rise. This would occasion another substantial Federal deficit with its inflationary consequences. At a time when goods are still scarce and spending power is high, this could have disastrous results.

Mr. President, I have undertaken to state in some detail the effects of the portal-to-portal litigation upon the Federal Government itself. I refer to the effects which necessarily will result from the successful maintenance of these portal-to-portal suits. As I look over this Chamber and notice the comparatively small number of Members of the Senate who are present at the moment, I observe among them several Senators who have served as governors of their States. Those Senators will immediately realize, as does the Presiding Officer, and as I do, the necessary impact upon State and local governments which comes from portal-to-portal claims asserting vast liabilities which will reduce the income of industries and, in some cases, doubtless will be followed by requests for refunds of State taxes, and will prevent the expansion and even the normal development of industry, with its consequent ordinary increase in tax revenues to the States. The committee's report states:

That the injurious impact of portal-to-portal claims on Government will not be confined to the Federal Government, but will also be felt by State and local governments throughout the Nation is clear.

Mr. President, I have just been reading a statement contained in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary. I should perhaps ask the pardon of the Senate for having in a number of other instances done so without mentioning the fact that in many instances, my remarks were being based on statements set forth in the committee report, and that in other instances my remarks have either been based upon the report or have included the exact language of the report, to which careful attention has been given by the subcommittee; and, as I have indicated, the report has been approved by the Committee on the Judiciary.

On page 39 of the report it is further stated that—

Successful prosecution of these suits by employees against employers can reasonably be expected to result in efforts by employers to secure, from some of the State and local governments, rebates of taxes previously paid on the basis of business expenses smaller than those actually incurred, in view of the additional liability adjudicated by these suits against the employers.

Mr. President, at this time I digress to say a word also with respect to some of the staff of the Judiciary Committee who have rendered notable service to our subcommittee. For instance, there sits at my left Mr. David Kammerman, who was in the audience during much of the argument on Friday; and I also desire to refer to Mr. Rice, of the Office of the Legislative Counsel, and Mr. Boots of that office and also Mr. Arens. They have rendered invaluable service to the committee, not only in the performance of assigned duties, but also in making suggestions and research and in rendering help along all lines. Although, as I have said, the report has received the careful attention of the subcommittee and has been worked over with care by the subcommittee, it contains much of the very fine work of those gentlemen, particularly Mr. Kammerman; and in the bill itself appears much of the fine work of Mr. Boots and Mr. Rice, of the Office of the Legislative Counsel, and also certain of the work, very valuable indeed, of Mr. Arens, of the office of the Committee on the Judiciary. No doubt I have overlooked some of those who have assisted; and, indeed, the entire clerical force have given us the utmost of cooperation in respect to their respective tasks.

I proceed with the reading with respect to the pending suits, and their effect upon local and State governments. The report says:

Moreover, with the injury to various industries which would result from successful prosecution of portal-to-portal suits, might come the closing of business establishments with resulting decreases in taxes for the benefit of State and local governmental units. These governmental results are, of course, in addition to the general harmful economic results to the respective communities consequent upon financial stringency or the closing down of local industries.

So, Mr. President, we find that the impact of this litigation, surprising as it was to the Nation, is not only upon the employers, large and small, in our Nation, not only upon the merchants, not only upon the employees in the retardation of expansion and the lessened opportunity for employment, not only upon the farmers, not only upon the Federal Government, but upon the cities and the towns and the villages and the States, from the standpoint of the revenues of the respective governmental subdivisions. But this is not the only effect this vast mass of litigation is having and will have. I come now to the effect upon the relations between labor and management.

In the first place, delay in the conclusion of collective bargaining agreements will be likely to occur if the portal-to-portal principle is allowed to become established, because if the portal-to-portal problem is not settled in the reasonably near future—and it can be settled only by Congress—it is probable that large segments of industry will be operating on the basis of temporary extensions of labor contracts, because the employer will be in poor position to negotiate specific matters with respect to wages and working conditions over the coming year so long as there impends the threat of heavy portal-to-portal liabilities.

Mr. President, put yourself in the position of an employer who has to meet with his employees to make a labor contract for the next year, and you have no knowledge as to whether the existing suits against your company will wipe out your company or not. They are pending, they are interfering with your bank credit, they are interfering not only with your expansion, but the maintenance of your normal operations. They are piling up heavy costs, and the cost of the mere preparation for trial of the law suits amounts to thousands and thousands of dollars in your particular establishment. In what position are you, with possible bankruptcy confronting you, to make contracts by collective bargaining agreements with your employees in the period of uncertainty created by this portal-to-portal litigation?

Mr. President, what is the effect which is apt to result from delay in collective bargaining? It has been my privilege to serve in the Seventy-ninth Congress on the Committee on Education and Labor, and in this Congress upon the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. We had before us in the Seventy-ninth Congress—I am not certain whether they have been before the present committee—repeated criticisms made by responsible leaders of labor, doubtless sincere criticisms, of certain great employers, on the ground of their delay in concluding collective bargaining agreements. It built up a vast ill will between the employees, it was asserted to our committee, and I think demonstrated.

Now, Mr. President, along comes the delay occasioned by the uncertainty on the part of industry as to how it stands, and what it can afford to pay; and what is this delay likely to create? Certainly, in the language of our report, delay thus occasioned may reasonably be expected to create dissatisfaction among employees, culminating possibly in strikes and labor disturbances, in addition to ill will engendered on the part of employees against employers, because of the fact that collective-bargaining agreements will not have been effected.

Mr. President, not only is there a strong tendency toward the creation of ill will on the part of employees against employers, but the correlative, namely, the creation of ill will on the part of employers against employees is likely to develop because of the insistence of employees upon the recognition of claims which the employers deem to be ill-founded. The ill will on both sides may well impede negotiations for friendly and harmonious settlement by collective bargaining of matters which normally could be agreed upon without difficulty.

Mr. President, there is a third party in interest. There is management and there is labor, but after all there is the public, 140,000,000 people of our country, to whom the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] referred clearly and convincingly on Friday last. The consequent effect upon this great public arising from increased lack of harmony between employer and employee is obvious.

Mr. President, the portal-to-portal litigation, while it is brought on behalf of employees for their alleged benefit—yes, for their actual benefit, in dollars and cents, if they shall prevail—opens up vast possibilities for dissatisfaction between those very employees themselves. It must be remembered that these suits do not cover specific benefits for labor groups as a whole, such as a general wage increase, but rather they go to the amounts claimed by each individual worker for his own walking time, make-ready time, cleanup time, and so forth. Hence the disposition of these suits could involve countless individual judgments for amounts which would vary as between worker and worker. Obviously the possibilities for dissastisfaction between employees in such a situation are very great. Those who receive amounts smaller than are received by their fellow workers in the same plant—because the amount of time consumed by one group in walking to the work bench is less than that consumed by their fellow workers—are likely to be disgruntled in many instances, and the net effect could very well be unsettling to labor peace and productivity.

In such cases, if any portal-to-portal claims as may be legally susceptible of settlement through collective bargaining—and I have this afternoon indicated the effect of the Brooklyn Savings Bank case, so far as the impossibility of settling, in the very large majority of cases, I take it, is concerned—it is difficult to conceive of the labor union itself being able to compute, with reasonable satisfaction to all employees, the respective participation of the several employees in the recoveries which shall be effected by such collective bargaining.

In such cases, therefore, Mr. President, dissatisfation among some employees whose claims shall have been adjusted by such bargaining is not at all unlikely, and may reasonably be expected to foment unrest within the labor union itself.

A further very practical and distressing result is very apt to follow from the maintenance of these suits, particularly in view of the fact that in large portions of them the employer sees the possibility, as do the employees, of the employer's recovering promptly from the Government all that he has paid out, thereby being able to give to the employees substantial amounts at no cost to the employer. In other words, there is a temptation both to the employees and to their employer, to negotiate, without litigation if practicable, or if necessary, through litigation, settlement with respect to such claims, on the theory that the employer may, in view of his ability to recover either a tax refund or complete reimbursement from the Federal Government, on account of any sums he may pay in settlement of such claims, be able to effect the settlement with his employees at little or no expense to himself.

If the United States Treasury is required to reimburse the employer, the bill will be paid either in great part or in whole by the Government, that is to say, by the taxpayers. If the employer has it within his power to ingratiate himself with his employees by making a substantial settlement with them, and if he knows that the next day or the next week he will get his money back from the Government, obviously, in some instances, at any rate it is not at all unlikely or unreasonable to assume that an employer will be very liberal in making the settlements, because he knows he can get the money back, Mr. President, from you and from me and from all the other taxpayers of the United States.

In response to questions the other day by the distinguished junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], I discussed very briefly the tendency of this type of liability to create champertous activity; that is to say, activity encouraging and stirring up litigation. The claim of employees to ownership rights of the portal-to-portal variety is a likely and fruitful source of champertous activity among those who, for expectation of financial profit to themselves, may desire to stir up litigation between employer and employee.

Not only is there a strong likelihood of the creation of renewed and more and more vigorous efforts toward the bringing of such lawsuits, if the present 1913, or any material portion thereof, shall be sucessful; but, in addition, the labor unions are going to be confronted with the very practical problem as to what to do with respect to assisting their own members in bringing further suits. The testimony was that the American Federation of Labor up to this time has taken very little affirmative action in the assertion of portal-to-portal claims. True it is that Mr. Pressman referred to the Dow Chemical Co. decision as being one in which the American Federation of Labor had acted, and, as indicated in his testimony, the fact that the American Federation of Labor did act placed a responsibility on the CIO of determining whether it should acquaint its members with the opportunity to make settlements through the medium of such suits.

But, Mr. President, suppose that the suits which have been filed should be successfully maintained, what will there be left for the American Federation of Labor to do? The CIO membership will have collected in a great multitude of these suits, and the A. F. of L. membership will have sat idly by without filing its suits. Obviously the American Federation of Labor, in self-defense and as a means of holding its own membership, may be forced to enter into activities in connection with future portal-to-portal suits and may be compelled to send to their own members substantially the same type of literature as that which the CIO affiliates sent to theirs. In other words, the A. F. of L., in order to preserve itself and keep from losing its own membership, may find it necessary at least to become active in or perhaps assist in the bringing of suits by its membership; and when it gets down to the point of labor unions, in self-preservation, finding it necessary to run a race, one with another, as to which can benefit its own members the most, we shall have arrived at a point where, I undertake to say, the stirring up of litigation will have become a vast ethical and economic evil, as well as leading to congestion in the courts of the United States and of its various subdivisions.

I referred to the possibility of settlements being made by corporations. There was one made that I know of, to which I have referred, the settlement made by the Dow Chemical Co. I have in my hand a photostatic copy of the issue of Business Week, of November 23, 1946, in the course of which occurs this paragraph:

> Bargaining issue?—Some factors in the steel industry are inclined to regard union threats of suits covering 800,000 members in basic steel and fabricating plants as a bargaining issue for contract negotiations which will open in mid-January. At that time, lump-sum retroactive portal-to-portal payments might be asked by the union in return for foregoing a substantial wage boost, as in the recent Dow Chemical settlement.

Is it not interesting, to say the least, that in the Dow Chemical settlement the payment was made by that company, and the employees waived, as I understand, a substantial wage boost? In other words, the Dow Chemical Co., which according to my information, has either received or will receive back from the Government a very large proportion of the $4,665,000 which it paid, secured a consideration, obviously, from the employees for making the settlement, in that the employees forewent their claim for additional wage boosts for the coming year, in substantial amounts.

Is it not clear, Mr. President, that in the face of such a situation as this, there is a strong tendency on the part of corporations to enter into negotiations with labor unions, to accept judgments against themselves in large amounts, in consideration of the union itself waiving some of its rights to additional compensation, and then the corporation, after having thus given to the union what the union would otherwise have acquired, perhaps from the company by collective bargaining agreements, the company itself goes down to the Treasury of the United States and gets its money back.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to ask the Senator, if in the Dow Chemical case which he has just cited, it is not a possibility that the corporation already has or may have the power to shift the burden of that settlement to the taxpayers of the country?

Mr. DONNELL. Precisely; the Senator is exactly correct. He has made it so clear that the record on that point cannot be escaped.

Mr. President, the New York Times, in its issue of December 22, 1946, has this to say with respect to the Dow Chemical Co.'s settlement:

> An out-of-court settlement amounting to $4,665,000 for back travel pay was reached recently by the Dow Chemical Co. and District 50 of the United Mine Workers, A. F. of L. This indicated a possible course which the lawsuits may take in connection with wage bargainng.
> It is questionable whether an outright waiver of the lawsuits in return for wage increases would wipe out an employer's liability, if it exists, but the suits could be settled through a peaceful, legal procedure whereby the unions simultaneously could agree to modify their wage demands.

In the Dow Chemical case, the union withdrew its demand for a flat increase of 20 cents an hour and advised its members they would receive the equivalent of an 11-cent increase through travel-time pay.

Claims for travel-time pay in the past were settled on the basis of about 21 minutes a day, but the new wage agreement significantly provides for compensation on the basis of about 27 minutes a day.

In other words, Mr. President, the Dow Chemical Co. found it advisable to make this settlement and, as I have indicated and as the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] has observed, it is entirely possible that corporations can well afford to be very liberal in these settlements, or if they cannot make settlements, can afford to be very lax in their defense of litigation, knowing, as they well know, that they may secure reimbursement from the Government, and at the same time may make settlements with the unions ingratiating themselves with the unions without increasing wages to the point to which they would have been compelled to increase them had they not been able to turn over to the employees these vast amounts of portal-to-portal wages.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. At the appropriate time I should like to ask the distinguished Senator a question or two with reference to the statute of limitations. I do not want to disturb his speech. Is this the appropriate time, or will the Senator reach the stage later when such question would be more appropriate?

Mr. DONNELL. I should prefer that the Senator from Florida defer the question until later. I shall take up the statute of limitations and shall certainly welcome questions from the Senator on that subject.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator pointed out that contractors having war contracts with the Government may settle their claims for portal-to-portal activities with employees, and then ask the Government for reimbursement in the amount of the settlement. Does the Senator know whether the Government is prepared to audit and supervise such settlements to determine whether in fact valid claims are asserted against the war contractor for which reimbursement may be asked of the Government?

Mr. DONNELL. Perhaps before I complete my answer I may be able to put my hand on the exact language, but if I cannot I am sure that I am giving substantially the testimony which was presented to us, namely, that, in the first place, the Department of Justice does not have sufficient members in its legal staff to handle the legal work. In the second place, that the district attorneys over the United States do not have sufficient forces in their offices to handle the legal work. Thus making it true that in the case of the defenses which are being handled throughout the country, the attorneys for the companies themselves are being called in to assist in the defense, and are being permitted to assist, with certain limitations to which I shall refer. In the third place, according to the very graphic language of one of the witnesses—and if I do not find it at the moment I shall put it in the RECORD a little later—there are not enough accountants—and I think he said lawyers, but certainly accountants—in the United States to handle the work involved in making the computations and clerical work which would be necessitated in handling these claims.

Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. DONNELL. May I ask the Senator, who is a distinguished member of our subcommittee, whether or not his recollection substantially agrees with mine in regard to that testimony?

Mr. COOPER. It does.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, as a result of these various facts, the impacts of these suits upon the individuals, upon the companies, upon the Government itself, upon the local divisions of government, upon labor and management themselves, I take it to be manifest that in the public interest action—prompt action—should be taken by the Congress.

To summarize certain of the probable future consequences which would arise from inaction by Congress as to future accruing liabilities, I should like to make mention of a few facts. I do so, Mr. President, because someone may say "Perhaps it is all well enough to dispose of the pending portal-to-portal claims, get them out of the way, extinguish them in some manner by law, but why should we legislate as to the future?"

I undertake to say that, so far as is legislatively possible, Congress should see to it that the opportunity for the recurrence of such a condition of surprise and disaster to American industry should not be permitted to arise. Thus, it is that it becomes of great importance to legislate not only as to existing claims, but as to future claims, defining as best it is possible in legislation the measures of liability, the type of activities which are not compensable except by custom or by contract.

Mr. President, if Congress should not act as to future accruing liabilities numerous results would occur. In the first place, both employers and employees would be unable to determine without extensive, expensive, and prolonged litigation to final judgment in a court of last resort the amounts owing to employees for activities of the portal-to-portal type which shall hereafter be engaged in by employees. I may point out in that connection that there is a tendency undoubtedly existent to extend the doctrine of portal-to-portal liability to a point which has never been dreamed of. I give merely one illustration of that tendency.

There appeared before the committee as witnesses a Mr. Conover, of the American Mining Congress, and a gentleman from the State of our distinguished colleague, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] who accompanied his constituent to the committee hearing. Both men testified to the fact that in the case of the potash miners near Carlsbad, N. Mex., some 12 miles from Carlsbad, the employees have already filed suits aggregating millions of dollars, not solely for liability upon the premises of the employers, but for the time consumed in traveling from Carlsbad to the place of employment 12 miles away. The testimony of the gentleman from the Carlsbad plant was to the effect that the employees do what most of us do in traveling on long bus rides, either read or sleep. Obviously they were not performing activities for the employer. Yet the theory of the employee is that in order for the employee to get to his work he had to ride; in order to ride he had to put in the time to ride; and therefore the employer must pay him for the time involved in going from his home or from the place where he got on the bus, perhaps in the city of Carlsbad, all the way to the mine. That is a vast extension of the doctrine set forth in the Mount Clemens case, for the Mount Clemens case defines itself solely to activities upon the premises of the employer. But in the case of the Carlsbad illustration, even the busses in which the employees travel are not owned directly or indirectly by the company, but are the property of some third party.

We may well expect further extensions. I can well see how an employee may say, "In order to be fit to work on my days of employment, not only must I travel by bus, but I must get up and wash myself and dress. That is all time that is put in for the benefit of the employer, and I shall hold the employer liable."

So, Mr. President, unless we draw a line and say, "Before this line items shall not be compensable unless by contract or custom," we are in constant danger of an ever-expanding application of the doctrine of portal-to-portal pay so as to run not merely from the portal of the employer's premises to the place of work, but from the portal of the employee's home, or perhaps from his dining table. Who knows what extension will be made, in the light of the case now pending in New Mexico for millions of dollars based upon riding in busses not owned by the employer, while the employee sleeps or reads in transit?

Unless we have action by Congress as to future accruing liabilities, employers and employees will in many instances be unable in the future to make voluntary settlement, compromise, release, or adjustment of claims arising out of such activities. At this point let me say that we have recognized in our bill, by not making the provision for compromise and settlement applicable to the future, that there is a grave danger of placing a provision of that kind in the bill as to future activities, because such a provision might well result, as in the case of the Brooklyn National Savings Bank, in the utter demolition of the Fair Labor Practices Act.

Mr. President, if Congress shall not act as to the future, I have indicated that among the results of such inaction is likely to be the prospect of increasing demands for payments to employees for engaging in other activities, no compensation for which was contemplated by either the employer or the employee at the time when the employee was engaged. If Congress shall not act now as to future accruing liabilities, there will still exist as to such future liabilities the likelihood of stirring up champertous practices and congestion of the courts. If Congress shall not act now as to future claims, there will be the probability of extended and continuous uncertainty to be experienced by industry—both employer and employee—as to the financial condition of productive establishments, with consequent halting of expansion or development, and retardation of employment.

If Congress shall not act now as to future activities, there may well be expected the infliction of hampering restraints and restrictions on commerce and on the development thereof, nationwide industrial conflict, unrest, and disputes between employers and employees, as well as between employee and employee. If Congress shall not act now as to the future, there is grave likelihood of continued inequality of competitive conditions as between employers, and between industries, due to the fact, as between employers, that one employer may have a plant physically so located that his portal-to-portal time is greater than that of an employer across the street who, because of his physical location, does not find the same necessity for long walking spaces for employees.

If Congress does not act now as to future accruing liabilities, serious and diverse effects upon the revenues of Federal, State, and local governments may well be expected in the future, just as they are manifesting themselves under present conditions, with respect to past activities.

A little while ago the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] asked about the statute of limitations. With his indulgence, I still ask that his questions be deferred until I take up the bill, in a very few minutes.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Can the able Senator give the Senate any notion as to when he will get down to the point where he is to discuss the bill, and will have finished discussing the facts leading up to it?

Mr. DONNELL. I should say in the course of three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. LUCAS. At that time we will get to the meat of the situation.

Mr. DONNELL. I should say that we have been at the meat of the situation throughout this entire discussion. I shall take up the details of the bill; but I think it is of highest importance that the Senate have before it, and that the public know, the facts which make it imperative that Congress act. I regard that as just as much the meat of the situation as the physical formation of the bill which is upon the desks of Senators.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not disagree with the Senator. The only thing I was attempting to ascertain was when the Senator would finally, after discussing the facts, reach the legal points which are involved in the bill. I appreciate that before discussing the legal points it is necessary to build a foundation of facts so that the RECORD may be clear. However, Senators have asked me to interrogate the able Senator in an effort to determine when he will reach that point, because Senators are interested.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator. I should say that in my judgment certainly within three-quarters of an hour I shall take up the details of the bill. Before that time I shall address myself to the question of the constitutionality of setting aside and overcoming the existing litigation; and in that connection I shall discuss certain decisions of the Supreme Court bearing upon that question.

Referring to the statute of limitations, I invite attention to the fact that the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 does not contain any limitation provision, and that the State statutory periods of limitation, as of 1938, vary from 1 year to 12 years. As of 1945, which is the last year with respect to which I have information, they vary from 6 months to 8 years.

The committee believes that these varying and extended periods of time for which, under the laws of the several States, potential retroactive liability may be imposed upon employers, have given and will give rise to grave difficulties in the sound and orderly conduct of business and industry. I might illustrate the effect of the varying statutes of limitations in this way: For example, Iowa has a 2-year statute of limitations; Illinois, 5 years; Minnesota, 2 years; Wisconsin, 6 years. Other illustrations are: Massachusetts, 6 years; North Carolina, 3 years; and South Carolina, 1 year.

Take, for example, a concern in Iowa, which cannot be sued for portal-to-portal pay, under the State statute, for more than 2 years back. Certainly an employer in that State is in a more advantageous position competitively than is an employer in the State of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], where the limit of the period for which an employee may go back is 5 years. In Minnesota the limit is 2 years. In Minnesota an employer is certainly in a much more advantageous position than his competitor in Wisconsin, where the employee may go back for 6 years. In Massachusetts, in which State there are many textile mills, an employee may go back for 6 years. An employer in Massachusetts is in a much less advantageous position than an employer in North Carolina, where the employee can go back only 3 years. In South Carolina the limit is 1 year.

So, Mr. President, the importance of having an applicable uniform statute of limitations, I think, is obvious. I will say in this connection that Mr. Walling who, at the time of his testimony, was the Wage and Hour Administrator, had this to say on page 558 of the testimony:

> It is not necessary any longer to justify a uniform Federal Statute of Limitations. Events have proven ample justification. The only question at issue is the period which should be provided.

I call attention also to the fact that Mr. John Abt, who is counsel for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, New York, N. Y., said this in his testimony, at page 162:

> We favor writing into the acts a reasonable time limitation on the filing of suits. We believe that such a limitation is necessary in order to secure uniformity throughout the 48 States and to place this Federal question beyond the control of diverse State laws.

So, Mr. President, considering the nature of these circumstances, it is obvious that the Congress should take action in the public interest.

It may be said that all this trouble was occasioned by the Mount Clemens case. On February 8, 1947, Judge Picard, the United States district judge to whom the Mount Clemens case had been sent for retrial, dismissed the case. It will be recalled, Mr. President, that the judge found to be de minimis all the walking time and preliminary-activities time consumed by employees for which overtime compensation was sought under the act. Judge Picard was, however, careful to point out that his dismissal of the Mount Clemens case "should not be understood as holding that all portal-to-portal suits should be dismissed."

He further said:

> There may be and perhaps are many instances where walking time and preliminary-activities time consumed is of such an amount as to call for compensation that he normally is not now receiving, but this is not one.

Judge Picard's decision is, first, limited to the facts of the case only, and, second, is not a final decision and doubtless will not be accepted as such, but, in our judgment, will be taken to the Supreme Court. Moreover, the decision of Judge Picard dismissing the Mount Clemens case was handed down on February 8, 1947, which was after the case had been recommitted to the district court by the Supreme Court for the matter of computation. However, that decision is not at all indicative of the conclusion that the portal-to-portal issue is settled, as is clearly indicated from an Associated Press report in the Washington Sunday Star for February 9, 1947, the day after Judge Picard's decision, stating that the United Automobile Workers' attorney, Maurice Sugar, said the auto union would not withdraw any of its suits. Suits by this union alone reportedly total nearly $1,000,000,000. Mr. Sugar also was reported by the Associated Press as having stated that Judge Picard's decision "would not necessarily apply to other cases."

Furthermore, Mr. President, attention is directed to a news item from the New York Times of Tuesday, February 11, 1947, 3 days after Judge Picard's dismissal of the Mount Clemens case, which news item reads as follows:

> UAW SUES AGAIN DESPITE PORTAL BAN
> DETROIT, February 10.—Despite the dismissal on Saturday by Judge Frank A. Picard in the Federal District Court of the portal-to-portal and make-ready pay claims of employees of the Mount Clemens Pottery Workers Union, the United Automobile Workers, CIO, charged back into the legal fray today with a suit demanding more than $200,000 on behalf of 148 members of local 155 against the Vincent Steel Process Co., an automotive parts manufacturer.
> In connection with the filing of the suit, Ernest Goodman, counsel for the UAW, said that the union took the position that the organization disagreed with the opinion of the judge who held that the time claims in the Mount Clemens were too trivial to recognize.

Union leaders still were silent, although Mr. Goodman said that the last of the suits had not yet been filed and that there would be a fresh wave as a result of the judge's decision.

Mr. Goodman said that "we disagree with some of the important aspects of the decision, particularly with reference to retroactivity."

"Judge Picard's decision," he added, "is inconsistent with the decision of the Supreme Court."

So, Mr. President, in view of these facts, and in view of the decision of Judge Picard, I take it that it is clear that Congress is not released from the very solemn obligation under which it finds itself to enact adequate legislation to cover the portal-to-portal situation.

It has been contended by some that any attempt to wipe out existing portal-to-portal claims would violate the Constitution of the United States, and particularly would violate the fifth amendment, which reads as follows:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor—

This is the portion of the fifth amendment to which the argument opposed to the constitutionality of the proposed legislation is directed—be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law—

Continuing, the amendment provides—nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Some have taken the view that, inasmuch as employees have worked for employers and have accumulated under the decision of Mr. Justice Murphy moneys owing to them for portal-to-portal activities, if Congress now steps in and undertakes to wipe out these claims, there will be a violation of the prohibition in the fifth amendment against the deprivation of one's property without due process of law.

The Supreme Court of the United States has in several decisions indicated views which appear to me amply to justify the conclusion that the proposed legislation can be constitutionally effected to prevent the maintenance or institution of these suits, and can do so even as to existing claims.

The first of the cases to which attention is respectfully directed is that of Norman v. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company (294 U. S. 240), decided on February 18, 1935, the decision having been handed down by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, beginning at page 291. This was known as the gold-clause case. It presents the question of the validity of the joint resolution of Congress of June 5, 1933, with respect to the gold clauses in private contracts for the payment of money. The resolution declared that—

Every provision contained in or made with respect to any obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular amount of coin or currency or in an amount of money of the United States measured thereby, is against public policy. Such provisions or obligations thereafter incurred are prohibited.

The resolution further provides that—

Every obligation heretofore or hereafter incurred, whether or not any such provision is contained therein or made with respect thereto, shall be discharged upon payment, dollar for dollar, in any coin or currency which at the time of payment is legal tender for public and private debts.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Is the Senator from Missouri now discussing the constitutionality of the bill as it has been reported by the committee?

Mr. DONNELL. Yes; I am discussing the general proposition as to the right of Congress to wipe out these suits; and of course this bill is framed upon the theory that the Congress has a right to wipe them out.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the Senator from Missouri that Congress has a right to pass legislation which would destroy the validity of the portal-to-portal pay suits.

Mr. DONNELL. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. I wish to ask the Senator a question, and I think it is important in view of the fact that now he is discussing the constitutionality of the measure which has been reported by the Judiciary Committee. Under section 2 (a), part II of the bill, is it the Senator's contention that every conceivable claim based on any activity not compensable by contract or custom or practice, is wiped out?

Mr. DONNELL. Will the Senator please repeat the question?

Mr. LUCAS. I wish to ask the Senator about the bill as it has been reported by the committee, and I have specific reference to section 2 (a) of part II. I ask him whether he believes that every conceivable claim based on any activity not compensable by contract or custom or practice, is wiped out by the bill. I am now talking about all claims over and beyond those which are set forth in the portal-to-portal suits, and I wish to know whether the bill includes such claims.

Mr. DONNELL. The answer, Mr. President, is that the section to which the Senator from Illinois has referred destroys every claim under either the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938—or perhaps I should say it provides that no employer is subject to any liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act on account of the failure of the employer to pay to an employee minimum wages or to pay an employee overtime compensation for or on account of any activities that an employee engaged in prior to the date of the enactment of the act, except those that were compensable by either contract, custom, or practice, as described in that section.

Mr. LUCAS. Then the Senator from Missouri and I are in agreement as to what this section means. In other words, any and all claims, over and above and beyond anything that has happened in these portal-to-portal suits, are also wiped out or outlawed, so to speak.

If my position is correct in that respect, I wish to make this further statement for the record; namely, that the section we are discussing contains no definition of portal-to-portal claims, and makes no distinction between suits based upon out-and-out violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Davis-Bacon Act, and the portal-to-portal suits. I think we can agree upon that.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Illinois has overlooked the fact that in section 5 of part II there is a definition of portal-to-portal activities. It reads as follows:

SEC. 5. Definition: As used in this part, the term "portal-to-portal activities" means those activities which section 2 hereof provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act.

I also call attention to the fact that in subdivision (b) of section 2 appears the following language:

(b) Each claim based on any portal-to-portal activities is hereby declared to be and is null and void and unenforceable.

Mr. LUCAS. I understand that. The point I make is that, as suggested by the able Senator, the definition of portal-to-portal claims is not confined to the portal-to-portal suits which brought on this legislation, but it goes beyond them and takes in the Walsh-Healey Act, the Bacon-Davis Act, and all other bases of actions of any kind or character which might be maintained by any person at the time. As to that point, the Senator from Missouri and I may differ with respect to the power which Congress has to go that far. I am afraid we are going off the deep end so far as that phase of the measure is concerned, when we consider the due process section of the Constitution.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Illinois for his observation, and I shall discuss his point as I proceed. I may say at this time, however, that the same constitutional point to which I shall refer in a moment in the Norman case, as I see it, applies in the case of every activity, and gives the Congress the power, in its judgment, if it deems the public interest to require it, to legislate out of existence any claim within the field of interstate commerce, over which Congress has power.

Let me also say, so that the RECORD may be perfectly clear, that the definition of portal-to-portal activities which is set forth in section 5 is—

Those activities which section 2 hereof provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment—

And those acts are only the ones which are not compensable either by contract or custom or practice.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I correct in my understanding that before the committee there is no evidence or any kind or character which involves the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act; and also that the amendments which are proposed to be made by the bill, insofar as actions brought under either of those acts are concerned, are purely gratuitous upon the part of the committee, and are not based upon any facts?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I do not think the interpretation of the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act is gratuitous upon the part of the committee. I am very happy to answer the Senator from Illinois, and I think he is entitled to know what the sentiment is.

In the first place, when the subcommittee started its hearings, I am frank to say that I had never heard of the Bacon-Davis Act, at least by name. I may have heard of the Walsh-Healey Act; it is possible that I had. But certainly neither of those acts was submitted to either our subcommittee or the full Committee on the Judiciary for consideration. However, as our hearings progressed, and somewhat, as I recall, near the conclusion of the hearings, a letter was received by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee from the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MOORE], calling his attention to the Walsh-Healey Act and raising the question whether some provision should be made with respect to it. Moreover, as I remember, at least one letter, and possibly more, came to my office from some one or more gentlemen, calling my attention to the Walsh-Healey Act, although I do not recall that the Bacon-Davis Act was so called to my attention.

Mr. President, as the so-called Gwynne bill, House bill 2157, was passed by the House of Representatives, it will be observed that the House of Representatives considered that the proposed legislation should apply not only to the Fair Labor Standards Act but also to the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act. Bearing that in mind, our subcommittee, after consultation with the main committee—and in referring to the subcommittee, I refer to both the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], and myself; I do not recall whether the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], was there or not—and in conjunction with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], had a conference, one day, with Mr. WALTER, a member of the House of Representatives Committee on the Judiciary, who if I am not mistaken, was the author of one of those acts, although his name does not appear on it. Certainly, however, he is well informed with respect to it. He gave us his views concerning the acts. He informed us, as I recall, that there had never been any suit filed under either of those acts. He indicated to us, however, the facts, and as a result of interrogation of him we were able to get what we thought was a pretty complete analysis of the facts which would give an employee under each of the two acts rights similar to those under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

I recall that in the case of the Bacon-Davis Act, which has to do with the construction of Federal buildings, I mentioned a certain situation. I am always thinking of my home State, and I said to him, "For instance, suppose a post office was to be built in Unionville, Mo." I may digress to say that it was my privilege to be present at the dedication of a post office in that city some years ago, and that was the reason why I happened to think of that one. I said, "Suppose a post office was to be built in Unionville, Mo., and the Westlake Co. was to build the post office, would the employees of that Westlake Construction Co. come under the Bacon-Davis Act?" Or words to that effect. He developed, of course, that they would. I think on reconsideration, I did not ask him if they would come under the act. I see obviously that they would.

I then put to him this series of facts: "Suppose that subsequently, in the case of the Westlake Construction Co., the employees of that company should hear of the doctrine of the Mount Clemens case, and should decide they also had walking time, while going from the entrance of the enclosure up to the place on the post office where they worked, and should assert a claim against the Westlake Construction Co., and should call upon the government representative by whom suits were brought under the Bacon-Davis Act, to bring suits in their behalf." I put that situation before Mr. Walters, and as the result of our conversation it was clear that in that case, should there be a recovery by the employees under the Bacon-Davis Act, it could be based on the same theory on which the suit would be based under the Fair Labor Standards Act. A similar illustration was put to him with relation to the Walsh-Healey Act, relating to the manufacture of caps for seamen in the Navy, and of course obviously the same answer applies.

So, Mr. President, after this conference with Mr. Walters, and after very careful consideration on the part of those of us who were on the committee, we determined to rewrite the bill, and we asked Mr. Rice, of the office of the legislative counsel, to perform what we thought was almost a superhuman task, rewriting the bill in one afternoon to get it ready for our committee the next morning, and have it printed so that we could have it before us with the new provisions in it.

In my judgment the Senator from Illinois is not correct in his assumption that the interpretation of the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts were gratuitous. It is true there was no evidence before the committee, in the printed hearings, but the committee made thorough and careful study of the matter, as I see it, and while not so extensive as our study of the Fair Labor Standards Act, I think our action in including those acts was based upon our study, and therefore was not gratuitous.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I desire to make my position perfectly clear with respect to the proposed legislation. The Senator from Illinois, as I think most other Senators are, is definitely in favor of legislation which will outlaw portal-to-portal suits, which are now giving the Senate and the country so much trouble. All I am attempting to ascertain from the able Senator is his view with respect to the constitutionality of the proposed act. I sincerely hope that when Congress finally passes a bill it will stand the test of the courts, and will not be a law which will invite all kinds of litigation in the future.

I know that as the result of the cumulation of hundreds of these suits throughout the country here and there in the different States, as the Senator has so ably explained, Congress undoubtedly has the power to arrest and deny any action in connection with such suits in the future, and probably outlaw the suits which have been started in the past.

What I am fearful of in connection with the pending bill is that we are delving into new fields, where there are no suits, where there is no evidence, where there are no charges of any violation, and if we are not careful we are going to take away from the individual citizen the inherent right of property he has under the due process clause of the Constitution. Rather than go too far in the legislation, I will say to the able Senator, I should prefer to confine the bill strictly to the portal-to-portal suits, where we know definitely we are on safe ground when we pass the measure.

I merely throw this into the argument for whatever it may be worth. I may be wrong. There are some able lawyers who will argue that we have no power and no authority, as legislators, to take away retroactively even the right to institute the pending suits. I do not agree with that contention in any way whatsoever, but I do say that when we step out and go further than what we have definitely and directly in front of us with respect to portal-to-portal suits, and attempt in a measure banning portal-to-portal suits to include suits under other legislative enactments about which no question whatsoever has ever been raised, either in the lower courts or the upper courts, under which no suits are now pending, and which acts are not before the Congress—when we outlaw all claims of any kind, and deny individuals an inherent right which they are entitled to exercise if they want to bring a suit of some kind, in my humble judgment, we are taking a chance. That, briefly, is my position.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BALDWIN. I do not know that my question is along the line of what the Senator from Illinois has just discussed, but there is oftentimes much contention over the interpretation of administrative orders which are issued pursuant to the acts referred to. For example, taking any provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act or the Wages and Hours Act, an employer may inquire whether a certain course of action constitutes a compliance with the act or some regulation issued pursuant to it, and he is advised, honestly and fairly, that it does. Later a new administrative order may be issued, or a court may render a decision which entirely reverses the ruling under which the employer has been operating. Is there anything in the bill which would protect an employer, and also an employee, since the employee is also entitled to know what his rights and privileges are, in a situation of that kind? It seems to me that has some bearing upon the very point the learned Senator from Illinois raised.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I am very glad to have the two Senators ask the questions that have propounded, and I am very grateful for the very clear exposition of his position by the Senator from Illinois, and for the very clear inquiry which has been made by the Senator from Connecticut.

In the first place, addressing myself to the proposition of the Senator from Illinois, I agree with him that it is of great importance that we attempt to make the bill unassailable, in other words, to make it clearly constitutional, if we can. Our committee has devoted a very great deal of thought, I will say to the able Senator, along those lines.

We have been confronted by the fact that there is a difference of opinion among lawyers, and I think it is only fair to say that we have tried to include the arguments on both sides, pro and con. We have had great numbers of briefs which we could not very well print because of considerations of expense, but I wish to say to the Senator from Illinois that included in the briefs we had printed is one on page 814 of the testimony and following by Mr. George Eric Rosden, of the District of Columbia Bar, which expresses the view, in substance, that legislation of the type which undertakes to wipe out existing claims is invalid.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, does that include all existing claims, or is he discussing the portal-to-portal claims?

Mr. DONNELL. He is talking about any existing claims, as I recall his brief. He says this:

> Several bills have been introduced in Congress designed to deal with portal-to-portal pay suits. Other legislative efforts are in preparation.
> Under these circumstances, we fail to see how Congress could constitutionally legislate away the rights which have already accrued under the statute, for it is a well-established doctrine that retroactive statutes are against due process, and therefore unconstitutional if they affect vested rights.

I think I should say, and I do say at this time, that included in our report we have set out not only Mr. Rosden's brief, but we thought it fair to set out the fact that he sent this brief to me as the result of a telegram from the president of the American Bar Association, Mr. Carl B. Rix, which reads as follows:

> Please take your excellent brief to Senator DONNELL with this telegram. He may desire to secure publication in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as matter of general interest.

That is from page 814 of the general transcript.

I should add, however, that I do not think there is anything in the record, and certainly nothing within my knowledge, that would indicate that the American Bar Association has passed upon this matter. But Mr. Rix of course is a very eminent lawyer. I am not acquainted with Mr. Rosden, so far as I recall, but the fact that Mr. Rix had requested him to take the brief to me indicates to me that Mr. Rosden is a gentleman of standing and his word should receive consideration.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. If the Senator from Maryland will indulge me for a moment, let me say that we also have set out in full in the record, the particular portions to which I am referring being pages 185 and following, a very interesting brief by Mr. Lee Pressman, in which, in substance, he takes the position likewise that legislation wiping out existing claims is unconstitutional. I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to interrupt the argument of the distinguished Senator from Missouri, but he may be able to give me a brief answer to the question I am about to ask. Does the bill as reported by the committee attempt to make the law as originally passed conform to what many people conceived to be its limitations or does the pending bill purport to take away certain legal rights which were perhaps expressly set forth in the original wage-and-hour bill? Do I make clear to the Senator from Missouri what I am trying to elicit from him? I am afraid I do not.

Mr. DONNELL. I am not quite sure I get the Senator's question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me put it this way: Does the bill now pending before the Senate take away from either employer or employee any rights which were given to him originally, but which we did not mean to give him, to the extent of the portal-to-portal suits as we have come to know them?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I do not think I can answer that question yes or no. I think the answer would require somewhat of an expansion. I shall certainly try to answer it to the best of my ability.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to divert the Senator from his argument. He has probably covered it before in his remarks, while I was out of the Chamber.

Mr. DONNELL. No; it has not been covered, I should say to the Senator. It should be covered, and it will be.

Let me say that in this bill we have not undertaken to say what was the intent of Congress in 1938. I should say that some persons thought we should expressly take the position that the Supreme Court of the United States had legislated by its action in the Mount Clemens case. I was one of those, a year or so ago, who took the position on this floor that Congress has no right to go back years ago and say what was the intent of Congress at that time. I think perhaps that statement should be modified to this extent, that if the reports or other legislative history enable us to judge of it, we might be able to do so.

The distinguished Senator will perhaps recall some years ago the resolution bearing upon the oil industry and the internal-revenue practices, under which Congress was besought to enact legislation saying that Congress meant something different than the law provided. The Senate, however, took the view that it could pass such a resolution, although I was in the minority. I remember the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] was likewise in the minority. I do not recall the position of the Senator from Maryland on that particular matter, but I want to say, in the pending legislation we have not undertaken to say what was the intent of Congress in 1938.

We take the act as it exists. We take the decision of the Supreme Court as it has been made. Realizing the pendency of the tremendous economic problem presented by the portal-to-portal situation, we attempt to strike at those claims and wipe them out. In order to do so we find it necessary to cover the entire 24 hours of the day, and perhaps to wipe out some claims, as to which there is strong argument that they should not be wiped out. I am coming to that, and I shall argue it fully before we finish.

But the real purpose of this proposed legislation is to dispose of the existing portal-to-portal cases, and we do not see any way to do except to take the entire activities of the entire 24-hour day, and provide by law that none of them shall be compensable unless by contract or custom.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I am speaking, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] appropriately suggests, solely as to existing claims, past claims. We approach the question as to future claims in quite a different manner. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator for his explanation. As I understand the general philosophy of the committee's approach to this problem, if payment has been made by practice for portal-to-portal, work or activities, the committee measure does not interfere with that?

Mr. DONNELL. The committee does not make noncompensable such activities. In other words, it leaves them compensable.

Mr. TYDINGS. And if by custom?

Mr. DONNELL. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but, in the interest of accuracy, we say that if there is a custom or practice, not inconsistent with the contract of the individual, under which custom or practice payment was made for certain activities, the employees shall be entitled to compensation for them, whereas we provide conversely that in the absence of such custom or practice, they shall not be so entitled.

Mr. TYDINGS. Particularly, I think the committee makes this broad approach—and I ask the Senator to correct me if I am wrong—that if payment has been made in the past as a matter of custom, or if payment for portal-to-portal activities is provided for in the contract, the committee bill makes no change, and does not prescribe payment for work in either of those two categories.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is in the "twilight zone," so to speak where payment has not been made in prior practice, and where payment is not provided for in the contract, and therefore the question arises as to whether or not in good faith the employer and the employee assume that payment could be made under the Wages and Hours Act, in that twilight zone? That is primarily I believe the place from which most of these suits have sprung, from the twilight zone, rather than practice or contractual obligation; and it is particularly in that twilight zone that the committee is attempting now to legislate to clear up that matter. Is that a broad statement of the sitution?

Mr. DONNELL. I appreciate that one man may use an expression differently from the way another man uses it. I do not regard it as a "twilight zone." I should say that recognizing the grave economic problem, what we do is to undertake to wipe out all pending portal-to-portal cases, so far as it is humanly possible to do so. In order to do that, we find it necessary to provide that any activity which is not compensable, either by contract, or by custom or practice not inconsistent with the contract, shall not be compensable. Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. TYDINGS. That pretty well answers it, because, although I take it the committee might like to have considered each case all over the country on its merits, in the nature of things it had to take action, and the fairest way it could act in the interest of employer and employee was to take the cases that came in the real category of right, and put them to one side, and in all the questionable cases, as to who was right and wrong, which were not covered by contract or were not covered by prior practice, the committee said, "We will knock all these out, because it is impossible to run a line through all of them with exact justice."

MR. DONNELL. I think the Senator has very clearly stated the situation. Mr. President, I do not want to make myself unduly apologetic to the Senate, but I can well appreciate that the Senate may feel somewhat wearied by detailed presentation of some of these matters, yet I think it is well to let the Senate know something of what the mental processes of the subcommittee and of the committee were.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] has asked whether or not there is any provision in the bill bearing upon the acts done or omitted in good faith in accordance with or in reliance upon any regulation, order, interpretation, ruling or practice of the Administrator. I call to his attention pages 20 and 21 of the bill wherein it is provided, in paragraph (1) of section 10:

> The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end of section 16 the following new subsection:
> "(d) Neither liability nor punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of this act, nor liability for an additional amount as liquidated damages under section 16 (b) of this act, shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice of the Administrator, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice, after such act or omission, is amended or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect."

There is a similar provision in the next subsection of section 10 with reference to the Walsh-Healey Act. The reason why there is no corresponding subsection dealing with the Bacon-Davis Act is that there is no provision in the Bacon-Davis Act with respect to liquidated damages.

In the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] I had not intended today to make mention of his comment to the effect that there is no liquidated damage provision in either the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act. I think the Senator is in error in regard to the Walsh-Healey Act, and I shall call it to his attention at the next session of the Senate when he is present. I think there is a provision for liquidated damages therein.

Mr. President, I shall discuss the section which I have read in response to the question of the Senator from Connecticut when I reach it in the bill. I may say to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] that I was stating briefly—and I shall go into it a little more fully later—the provision in regard to acts done or omitted in good faith in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice of the administrator. The reason I call this to the attention of the Senator from Nebraska is that he has been very courteous in consultation with our subcommittee with regard to some thoughts he has on the matter. I do not know whether he has come to a final conclusion, and I suggest that at the moment we defer any action on it, but I wanted the Senator from Nebraska to know at the moment that we were discussing that matter.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Those of us who are members of the Small Business Committee are interested in seeing that in the Senate committee's substitute bill provision is made to protect the employer in connection with what we call good faith and reliance upon orders issued, and so forth.

The question was raised by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] as to whether or not facts had been presented to the committee upon which the constitutionality of the act might rest. I should like to say that we have called that matter to the attention of the committee many times. Committee members have talked to many business organizations. There are thousands of portal-to-portal suits on file. There have been decisions in the circuit courts relative to who is a retailer and who is not, who is a laundryman, for example, and who is this, that, and the other. A great deal of litigation has arisen dealing with such questions. I think the Congress has the right and the power to clarify the statute and give the relief our committee expects to ask.

I wish to thank the distinguished Senator from Missouri for having been so generous to us in permitting us to present our arguments. I expect to offer an amendment which will take care of the situation suggested by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut relative to the various orders which have been made, and supplemental orders which have been issued changing the original orders on which the businessmen relied in good faith, yet in the final analysis the businessmen become liable because some change in an original order has later been made. I think that particular subject is a very important part of the proposed legislation. It is taken care of in the House bill, and I think it should be taken care of in the Senate bill.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. The reason I raised the question Mr. President, was because I was in some doubt in my own mind as to whether this particular language contained in the bill is sufficiently broad to cover the whole general situation, because if it is then, of course, we get into the constitutional question which was raised by the able Senator from Illinois. Since the able Senator from Missouri, who has so eloquently and fully discussed the bill, says he is going to discuss that point later, I shall be happy to sit here and listen to the discussion, as I have done until now.

Mr. DONNELL. I appreciate the Senator's comment.

Mr. President, I was discussing the case of Norman v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. (294 U. S. 240). I had set forth a portion of the contents of the joint resolution of Congress of June 5, 1933, with respect to the gold clause of private contracts as to the payment of money. In this case suit was brought upon a coupon of a bond issued by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., in the sum of $22.50. The bond provided that the payment of principal and interest would be made in gold coin of the United States of or equivalent to the standard of weight and fineness existing on February 1, 1930.

I shall leave out much of the detail of the argument. The contention was made by the plaintiff in the suit that the resolution of Congress which declared that every provision which purports to give the obligee the right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency is against public policy. The plaintiff claimed that that provision of the Federal act was unconstitutional. He did so upon the theory that Congress has no right to invalidate the provision of existing contract inasmuch as such violation would in the contention of the plaintiff be opposed to constitutional provisions to which reference has been made.

The Court discussed on pages 306 and following the power of the Congress to invalidate the provisions of existing contracts which interfere with the exercise of its constitutional authority.

We had here, as will be seen, the case of a plaintiff who owned a bond which provided for payment in gold coin. He had advanced his money for the bond. He owned the bond. It was his property. The contract was his property. He chose to ask that the condition of the bond be complied with by either payment in gold or the equivalent in currency. Then he was confronted by the joint resolution of Congress which held that that provision was in effect against public policy and void.

The Court, after heading its third proposition on the matter in this language:

The power of the Congress to invalidate the provisions of existing contracts which interfere with the exercise of its constitutional authority—

Said this, among other things:

The contestants urge that the Congress is seeking not to regulate the currency, but to regulate contracts, and thus has stepped beyond the power conferred.

Then the Court says this:

This argument is in the teeth of another established principle. Contracts, however express, cannot fetter the constitutional authority of the Congress. Contracts may create rights of property, but when contracts deal with a subject matter which lies within the control of the Congress, they have a congenital infirmity. Parties cannot remove their transactions from the reach of dominant constitutional power by making contracts about them.

This principle has familiar illustration in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce. If shippers and carriers stipulate for specified rates, although the rates may be lawful when the contracts are made, if Congress, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, exercises its authority and prescribes different rates, the latter control and override inconsistent stipulations in contracts previously made. This is so even if the contract be a charter granted by a State and limiting rates, or a contract between municipalities and carriers.

The Court discusses the case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Mottley (219 U. S. 467) in which case the Court had held that a contract, valid when made for the giving of a free pass by an interstate carrier in consideration of a release of a claim for damages, could not be enforced after the Congress had passed a certain subsequent act. The Court in the Norman case said:

Quoting the statement of the general principle in the legal tender cases, the Court decided that the agreement must necessarily be regarded as having been made subject to the possibility that at some future time the Congress "might so exert its whole constitutional power in regulating interstate commerce as to render that agreement unenforceable or to impair its value." The court considered it inconceivable that the exercise of such power "may be hampered or restricted to any extent by contracts previously made between individuals or corporations." "The framers of the Constitution never intended any such state of things to exist." * * * Accordingly, it has been authoritatively settled by decisions of this Court that no previous contracts or combinations can prevent the application of the antitrust acts to compel the discontinuance of combinations declared to be illegal. * * * The principle is not limited to the incidental effect of the exercise of the Congress by its constitutional authority. There is no constitutional ground for denying to the Congress the power expressly to prohibit and invalidate contracts although previously made, and valid when made, when they interfere with the carrying out of the policy it is free to adopt.

Then the Court gives various illustrations, among them the case of Philadelphia Railroad Co. v. Schubert (224 M. S. 603). The Court continued:

In that case, the employee, suing under the act, was a member of the relief fund of the railroad company under a contract of membership made in 1905, for the purpose of securing certain benefits. The contract provided that an acceptance of those benefits should operate as a release of claims, and the company pleaded that acceptance as a bar to the action. The Court held that the Employers' Liability Act applied the governing rule and that the defense could not be sustained. The power of the Congress in regulating interstate commerce was not fettered by the necessity of maintaining existing arrangements and stipulations which would conflict with the execution of its policy. The reason is manifest. To subordinate the exercise of the Federal authority to the continuing operation of previous contracts would be to place to this extent the regulation of interstate commerce in the hands of private individuals and to withdraw from the control of the Congress so much of the field as they might choose by prophetic discernment to bring within the range of their agreements. The Constitution recognizes no such limitation.

After citing authorities—

The same reasoning applies to the constitutional authority of the Congress to regulate the currency and to establish the monetary system of the country. If the gold clauses now before us interfere with the policy of the Congress in the exercise of that authority they cannot stand.

That was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case decided, as I have indicated, in 1935. As I see it, as I have indicated, the key sentence in Chief Justice Hughes' decision is that "contracts may create rights of property; but when contracts deal with a subject matter which lies within the control of the Congress, they have a congenital infirmity."

In other words, the Chief Justice recognized the facts as indicated in something else which I read from his opinion, that when people contract within the range of a field over which Congress has jurisdiction they do so subject to the right of Congress to wipe out their rights under the contract. And I undertake to say that the right to wipe out such rights under a contract exists whether the rights under the contract are so-called vested rights, or are not vested rights.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the argument of the Senator from Missouri is very sound, and I do not believe it can be assailed as a sound proposition of law. Congress has the right to abrogate contracts which are against public policy. In the case of the portal-to-portal suits, however, most of those are not founded on contracts at all. They are founded upon the laws of Congress. So unless the right of the claimant in a particular suit is well defined in the law, it seems to me that Congress would be taking nothing away from him by outlawing portal-to-portal suits. If we can outlaw a contract, we certainly ought to be able to outlaw a practice which has not even been reduced to the formality of a contract, unless the act of the Congress itself prohibiting certain unfair labor practices gave the employee the right to bring the suit against his employer.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator for his observations. Let me say in that connection that the very fact that these rights of the employee to which reference is made have been created by statute is another ground upon which some lawyers argue that this type of legislation wiping out the claims would be constitutional, namely, that a right created by statute can always be wiped out by the enacting power prior to the translation of such right into the judgment of a court. So I think the Senator has done a real service in calling attention to the fact that the rights of these employees arise under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The proposed legislation would not abolish any contract right; would it?

Mr. DONNELL. It would abolish no contract right. It provides that no employee may have his activities compensated for unless they are compensable under a contract or under a custom or practice not inconsistent with the contract. In other words, if he has a contract, his right continues to exist.

Mr. FERGUSON. This is a pure statutory right under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

Mr. President, this is an exceedingly interesting legal point, and it is of great importance in connection with the proposed legislation. A number of cases have been cited, and doubtless other cases will be cited on the floor of the Senate. I shall not anticipate any of them at this moment, with one exception. I refer to the case of Lynch v. United States (292 U. S., page 571), decided in 1934. That was a year before the gold-clause case. It will be recalled that in the Lynch case the Court had before it certain policies of yearly renewable term insurance. The Court held, in substance, that those contracts are property, and that rights of private individuals arising under them are protected by the fifth amendment. The Court points out that the Congress has a right to withdraw the consent of the United States to be sued on a contract and leave people to their rights before the administrative branches of the Government, but that Congress has no right—in the case before it—to withdraw the rights of the holder under the renewable term insurance policy. I think that case will undoubtedly be cited by some Senator who has raised a question as to the constitutionality of the proposed legislation. I shall not discuss the case to any great extent. The Court said:

As Congress had the power to authorize the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to issue them—

That is to say, the contracts of war-risk insurance—

the due-process clause prohibits the United States from annulling them, unless, indeed—

And it is the word "unless" to which I invite the attention of the Senate—unless, indeed, the action taken falls within the Federal police power or some other paramount power.

The Court further said:

The Solicitor General does not suggest, either in brief or argument, that there were supervening conditions which authorized

Congress to abrogate these contracts in the exercise of the police or any other power. The title of the act of March 20, 1933, repels any such suggestion. Although popularly known as the Economy Act, it is entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States." Punctilious fulfillment of contractual obligations is essential to the maintenance of the credit of public as well as private debtors. No doubt there was in March 1933 great need of economy. In the administration of all Government business economy had becom urgent because of lessened revenues and the heavy obligations to be issued in the hope of relieving widespread distress. But Congress was without power to reduce expenditures by abrogating contractual obligations of the United States. To abrogate contracts, in the attempt to lessen Government expenditure, would be not the practice of economy, but an act of repudiation.

Mr. President, the reason I call attention to this excerpt is that in the Lynch case there was involved solely the question of the rights of holders of war-risk insurance contracts, and, as stated, the due-process clause prohibits the United States from annulling them, "unless, indeed, the action taken falls within the Federal police power or some other paramount power."

The Court further said:

The Solicitor General does not suggest either in brief or argument, that there were supervening conditions which authorized Congress to abrogate these contracts in the exercise of the police or any other power.

Mr. President, the case which is before us today, the portal-to-portal pay case, obviously presents an entirely different situation from that which was presented in the Lynch case from which I have read, for if there ever was a case in which supervening conditions make it desirable that Congress should wipe out any suits, it certainly has been demonstrated in this instance by the mass of testimony which is before the Senate in the volume from which I have quoted from time to time.

The doctrine of congenital infirmity, that is, the doctrine that when an individual enters into a contract in a field over which Congress has control, he enters into the contract subject to the right of Congress to repeal his rights, is expressed not only in the Norman case, the gold-clause case, but the court has by its action in another recent case similarly expressed itself. I refer to the case of the National Carloading Corporation v. Phoenix-El Paso Express (176 Southwestern (2d ed.) 564). It is a Texas case. I do not expect to show that the Supreme Court of the United States is sitting in Texas, but the Supreme Court of the United States had presented to it, by a document which I hold in my hand, namely, a petition for a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of Texas, the question to which I shall refer, and the Court acted upon this petition for a writ of certiorari, and by virtue of that action I take it the Supreme Court has indicated its views.

In the Texas case, which was decided on December 15, 1943, rehearing denied on January 19, 1944, a situation existed under which a motor carrier had a right to recover undercharges from a freight fowarder, and the motor carrier filed a suit against the freight forwarder, and then the claim was reduced to judgment. A Federal statute which was adopted after the institution of the suit granted immunity to the freight forwarder from liability for past acts and omissions, and thus precluded recovery by the carrier.

So there was a situation in which, when the plaintiff started on its suit, it was entitled to recover undercharges, but before the suit was reduced to judgment a Federal statute under which the rights existed was repealed, and the question arose as to whether or not this violated the fifth amendment to the Constitution. The plaintiff's contention was that the fifth amendment had direct application, inasmuch as the plaintiff had an accrued right, the same as money in the bank, except that it had not been collected, and that therefore when the Government, by congressional act, wiped out his right to the money, it was exactly the same as if property of a physical nature had been taken away from him.

What did the Court have to say about that? The Court said:

The plaintiff asserts that it has a vested right in the recovery herein and urges that to give a retroactive effect to the provision in question is violative of the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits deprivation of property without due process of law. With this contention we cannot agree. We are here dealing with the exercise by Congress of a power conferred by the Federal Constitution to regulate interstate commerce. The provisions of the fifth amendment may not be invoked to obstruct a national policy which Congress has the power to adopt. As illustrative of this principle is the case of Norman v. Baltimore & Ohio Ry. Co. (294 U. S. 240) * * * where Norman brought suit on an interest coupon of a bond providing for payment in gold coin equal to the standard weight and fineness existing on February 1, 1930.

The Court then proceeds to quote quite extensively from the decision of the Court in the Norman case, including the observation of Chief Justice Hughes, that contracts may create rights in property, but that when contracts deal with a subject matter which lies within the control of Congress they have a congenital infirmity, and that the parties cannot remove their transactions from the realm of constitutional power by making contracts about them.

The Supreme Court of Texas, after quoting further from the Norman case, says:

We think it therefore becomes evident that the plaintiff does not possess such a vested right as to come within the inhibition of the fifth amendment. Such a right must be something more than a mere expectation based upon an anticipated continuance of the existing law. It must have become a title, legal or equitable, to the present or future enjoyment of property, or to present or future enforcement of a demand, or a legal exemption from the demand of another. If, before rights become vested in particular individuals the convenience of the State induces amendment for repeal of the laws upon which they are based, these individuals are left without any remedy at law to enforce their claims; and if final relief has not been granted before the repeal goes into effect it cannot be granted thereafter, even if a judgment has been entered and the cause is pending upon appeal. The general rule is that when such law is repealed without a saving clause, it is considered, except as to transactions past and closed, as though it had never existed.

That was the decision of the Supreme Court of Texas.

There was filed in the Supreme Court of the United States on April 19, 1944, a petition for writ of certiorari in this case, and a brief in support thereof. In the course of the petition for the writ of certiorari is this language, at pages 10 and 11:

The ultimate question presented for review is whether or not said section 419 of part IV of the Interstate Commerce Act bars petitioner any recovery against respondent and has the effect of granting respondent immunity from liability for all freight charges incurred prior to the passage of said statute. The answer to this ultimate question depends upon the answers to the following three component questions: 1. Did Congress intend that section 419 of part IV of the Interstate Commerce Act apply to civil actions as well as to criminal liability? 2. Did Congress intend said statute to have a retroactive effect as to accrued civil causes of action? 3. If said statute should be applied to petitioner's cause of action, is said statute constitutional and not repugnant to the "due process clause" of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States?

Having received the petition, which as I have indicated bears the filing mark "April 19, 1944," the Supreme Court denied certiorari, the denial being reported at 322 U. S. 747.

I shall not go into much further detail as to the affirmative authorities supporting the right of Congress in this case. I think it has been demonstrated so clearly that it cannot be the subject of contradiction, that in the portal-to-portal cases Congress is dealing with a subject of interstate commerce, and, even more, it is dealing with a subject of national defense, notably in the case of the airplane industry and in the case of the mines, as to both of which the witnesses before our committee commented upon the importance of those particular industries from the standpoint of national defense, and in one case mention was made of the national security involved.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that the field within which Congress is here proposing to legislate obviously lies within the function and field in which Congress has jurisdiction, namely, interstate commerce and the protection of the Nation by means of military defense and other security.

Therefore, we come to the proposition that when a man comes forward with one of these portal-to-portal claims, which, whether created by contract or by statute, he may say has been virtually resolved into a vested right because he has worked for so many years and because Mr. Justice Murphy said certain activities, for instance, walking from the portal to the lathe, or taping the arms, and so forth, are compensable, and when in court he says, "These are property rights, and if the Congress takes them away from me, the Congress is violating the due process clause of the Constitution," the language of the Supreme Court clearly indicates, I undertake to say, in the cases I have read and in the action taken in the National Carloading case, that his contention is without adequate foundation.

Congress has adequate power, certainly, to protect the Nation against grave economic, financial, and other national disaster and injury to the public defense. Certainly Congress has power within those fields of action, and individuals who never have expected to collect a dime of the $5,785,000,000 cannot be heard in court to contend that their rights to such money, as windfalls which they never expected to get, are superior to the right of the Congress of the United States within the fields of interstate commerce and the protection of the security of our Nation.

There is one other observation along that line which I wish to make. It happens to be an observation which was made by the same Justice of the Supreme Court who handed down the decision in the Mount Clemens Pottery case. He said this, in the case of American Power and Light Company v. Securities and Exchange Commission, reported at 67 Supreme Court Reports 133, on November 25, 1946—last year, after the decision of the Supreme Court in the Mount Clemens case—I now read from page 139:

> Congress, of course, has undoubted power under the commerce clause to impose relative conditions and requirements on those who use the channels of Interstate Commerce so that those channels will not be conduits for promoting or perpetuating economic evils. * * * Thus to the extent that corporate business is transacted through such channels, affecting commerce in more States than one, Congress may act directly with respect to that business to protect what it—> conceives to be the national welfare. It may prescribe appropriate regulations and determine the conditions under which that business may be pursued. It may compel changes in the voting rights and other privileges of stockholders. It may order the divestment or rearrangement of properties. It may order the reorganization or dissolution of corporations.

I pause there, Mr. President, because while the action in this portal-to-portal matter is affecting the rights of labor, I call attention to the fact that in that case the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Murphy, said that Congress "may order the reorganization or dissolution of corporations."

Thus indicating clearly that the power of Congress is not confined solely to labor, but extends equally to management, under that decision of the Court.

I proceed further to quote the language of Mr. Justice Murphy in that case:

> In short, Congress is completely uninhibited by the commerce clause in selecting the means considered necessary for bringing about the desired conditions in the channels of Interstate Commerce. Any limitations are to be found in other sections of the Constitution—

Citing Gibbons against Ogden.

Then at page 141 we find the following:

> To deny that Congress has power to eliminate evils connected with pyramided holding-company systems, evils which have been found to be promoted and transmitted by means of interstate commerce, is to deny that Congress can effectively deal with problems concerning the welfare of the national economy. We cannot deny that power. Rather we reaffirm once more the constitutional authority resident in Congress by virtue of the commerce clause to undertake to solve national problems directly and realistically, giving due recognition to the scope of State power. That follows from the fact that the Federal commerce power is as broad as the economic needs of the Nation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] will, I anticipate, subsequently discuss the fact that the States themselves are not precluded by any provision of the Federal Constitution from asserting their own police power. He has certain authorities which are clear and conclusive.

Is it not true, as indicated in the Lynch case, where there is a showing of some supervening reason for action by Congress, that Congress, either under the Federal police power or under some other paramount power, has authority to act

Someone may say, "The Federal Government has no police power." I agree with the abstract statement that it has no independent police power; but certainly the Court has recognized without question the fact that in carrying out its other powers—as, for illustration, the commerce power—the Federal Government does possess a police power. That, I take it, is what is referred to in the Lynch case by the expression "Federal police power."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I ask the Senator whether it is a fact that Congress in the very enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act set aside and made invalid certain contracts of employers, to the temporary financial detriment of employers at that time.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, there can be no question whatever about that. The Senator from Kentucky is precisely correct.

Mr. COOPER. Then, is it not also true, following that precedent, that Congress has just as much power, in the public interest, to set aside certain contracts or certain statutory rights, even though to do so may be of temporary monetary disadvantage to the workers at this time?

Mr. DONNELL. I think the Senator's statement is unanswerable, and is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I wish to ask the distinguished Senator a question. I agree with him that under the commerce clause of the Constitution, Congress has a right to do what is proposed to be done by the pending bill with respect to portal-to-portal suits. However, the question which I should like to have answered is this: Had these claims not arisen, had all this confusion not existed, had nothing been done, through these portal-to-portal suits, to interfere with commerce, would the Senator still contend that under the commerce clause of the Constitution, the Congress would have a right, without any evidence of any kind or character before it, to enact the kind of legislation now proposed?

Mr. DONNELL. I would say, Mr. President, that I think the court would go a long way toward sustaining the presumption that Congress had some reason for any action it might take toward setting aside these rights. I should say that if it affirmatively should appear to the contrary, that there was no just basis for Congress doing it, if it should appear that it was purely arbitrary, capricious, or malicious, the court would have no hesitancy in setting aside the action of the Congress. But I undertake to say that in the case we have at hand the facts are so heavily upon the scale, without any contradiction whatever, as I see it, to the effect that the supervening conditions, to which the court refers in the Lynch case, do exist, and the recitals in the bill to which I shall have reference so clearly show those facts, that whatever the action of Congress whether it abolishes the rights solely of the portal-to-portal claimants, or whether in doing that we find it necessary to abolish other rights incidentally involved in connection with them, the record is so clear that the court, if it follows the rule in the cases I have cited, must sustain the legislation enacted by Congress.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALDWIN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I have no quarrel with the able Senator on the proposition he last submitted. I think what we are attempting to do, and the reason for it is clearly evident, and certainly unambiguous. The question I raised a moment ago was whether the Senator believed the Congress of the United States would have a right to pass legislation of this kind affecting the Fair Labor Standards Act if no portal-to-portal suits existed, if there were no evidence of any kind or character before the committee which would support such legislation, if there were no evidence which in anywise, so far as the facts were concerned, showed any huge economic upheaval or anything affecting the commerce clause. That is the point.

Mr. DONNELL. I welcome the opportunity to answer the question, because it gives me a chance to go even further than I did in my previous answer. In my previous answer I indicated that if Congress were shown to have a malicious reason, no just reason whatsoever, if it were merely arbitrary or capricious, the court might well hold that the action was invalid. But I wish to say two things: In the first place, the strongest presumption would exist in favor of the absence of such malice, the absence of such caprice. In the second place, I think perhaps I even conceded, by inference, more than I should have in my previous answer, for inasmuch as Congress had the right to give under the Fair Labor Standards Act, I know of no reason why it would not have the right to take away.

Mr. LUCAS. But the Senator has made the argument all afternoon, and correctly so, that the only basis for the proposed legislation was that the portal-to-portal suits were interfering with interstate commerce and that Congress could act under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and under that clause, the Congress has the right to nullify an existing contract.

Certainly if the Senate passed legislation of this character, without any evidence of any kind before it, its action in my humble opinion would be arbitrary and capricious, and by legislative fiat. The very reason why I raise the point is that, as I indicated to the Senator in the colloquy I had with him in the early part of the afternoon, when we step out beyond these portal-to-portal suits, which do definitely affect the commerce clause of the Constitution, then we are legislating arbitrarily and capriciously with respect to the Bacon-Davis Act and the Walsh-Healey Act, and all the other claims which are included which are not within the portal-to-portal claims.

I again in the utmost good faith, raise the question, because I am in serious doubt about the constitutionality of that phase of the Senator's bill as it has been reported, and I am attempting to make an argument that is plain and as it seems to me somewhat unanswerable, in view of the Senator's own statement that if the Congress arbitrarily and capriciously, and through whim, so to speak, passed a law of that kind, it would be unconstitutional. If there were nothing before the Congress upon which to act, the Supreme Court would have to say that its action was arbitrary, it seems to me. I pass on the suggestion for whatever it may be worth.

Mr. DONNELL. I appreciate the very interesting and very ably presented argument of the Senator from Illinois. I am not surprised at his ability to present it, because I have heard him on numerous occasions. I am glad he has contributed this view because we ought to consider it.

In the first place, when he states that I have been arguing that the only basis on which Congress could proceed was interference with interstate commerce, as presented by the portal-to-portal activities, the Senator is in error. I have argued as best I could, and I think the facts fully justify my argument, that the facts are so heavily upon the scale as to show beyond any shadow of doubt that conditions of the supervening act to which the Lynch case refers do exist in this case. So, whether, in the hypothetical case to which the Senator refers, assuming there was no evidence before this body at all, the act would be valid or invalid, I have not argued that this is the only basis. I never made that statement. I have said that the facts in the case are so predominant and overwhelming as to indicate beyond the shadow of a doubt that Congress has the right to legislate in this field.

To answer further the proposition the Senator makes with respect to caprice, I am inclined to think that in my answer to him earlier this afternoon I probably conceded more than I should have conceded, and in my subsequent answer I was quick to attempt to make clear that I thought that I had possibly done so.

As I see the matter, in the first place, the Congress has unfettered power within the domain of interstate commerce. It may well be that my statement about maliciousness or caprice might not at all meet the approval of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court might very readily take the view that the wisdom of Congress is final, and that what Congress has given by the Fair Labor Standards Act it could very well take away by the repeal of that act. So I say at this moment I am not conceding what I think I went too far in stating a few moments ago.

As I see it, affirmative evidence of the existence of malice or caprice on the part of Congress would have to be shown before the Supreme Court would even consider the proposition that the statute was void on such a ground. Whether the Court would so hold even then, I am not at all certain, but in the absence of any affirmative showing I do not consider that the lack of evidence before a committee would be determining, for a legislative body can take legislative notice, as the court can take judicial notice, of facts of which all are well informed.

So I say, first, there is no affirmative evidence in this case of any malice on the part of Congress. In the second place, the evidence is so overwhelming as to justify the Congress in acting in interstate commerce and national defense that there is no doubt of our right to do so.

The Senator from Illinois suggested there was doubt in his mind whether or not we are entitled, in remedying the portal-to-portal situation, to wipe out any rights other than those of portal-to-portal claimants. In my judgment the Supreme Court of the United States would hold that Congress has a right, in considering the entire problem, and the grave economic situation, to use, as Justice Murphy indicates in this opinion from which I read a few moments ago, its own means toward remedying the injustices and economic conditions. Remember, the Court said, on November 25, 1926, as I read:

> Congress is completely uninhibited by the commerce clause in selecting the means considered necessary for bringing about the desired conditions in the channels of interstate commerce.

True, the next line reads:

> Any limitations are to be found in other sections of the Constitution.

But obviously, from the Norman case and from the other cases to which I have referred, the Court holds that the due-process clause does not interfere with the right of Congress to legislate respecting interstate commerce.

In a little while I shall relate something of the history of this matter in our committee, for I think it may be of some importance when this case goes to the Supreme Court, as, of course, it will eventually do; but in the course of our deliberations we found it to be advisable, in our judgment, if not absolutely necessary, to make this legislation apply, as I have indicated, not merely to the periods at the beginning of the workday and at the end of the workday, but around the clock, for 24 hours. The mere fact that we shall doubtless wipe out some rights here and there—we hope they will not be many, but some of them, here and there—in the course of remedying this problem, does not mean that Congress would have violated its constitutional power in using this means to bring about the result of remedying the great evil which has arisen.

Mr. President, we have been very greatly concerned with how we could accomplish the result of wiping out the vast number of portal-to-portal suits, and I shall tell something of what went through our minds, in a moment, as to how to do it, and the difficulties of it, and why we adopted the particular plan that we did.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to point out, in answer to the question asked by the Senator from Illinois with respect to the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act, that both acts provide for the payment of minimum wages for work. Certainly, if the contracts under those acts affected interstate commerce, the same question of liability for portal-to-portal activities would apply to those contracts as to any other contracts; and certainly, even though as yet no suits have been filed under those acts, the contingent liability exists, and it would seem there is the same power to legislate as to those acts, even though no suits have been filed, as there is with respect to many other contracts, upon which no suits have been filed. The record shows that there have only been 1,902 suits filed. There is a possibility that many more suits will be filed, and it seems to me that contracts entered into under these two acts present a contingent liability. There is the opportunity for employees to sue, and, if legislation is possible in the field of interstate commerce, it is also possible under those two acts to legislate concerning contracts, affecting interstate commerce.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I have great respect for the opinion of the able Senator from Kentucky, and he may be correct in his conclusions as to the constitutionality of this measure. It includes claims under those two acts, the same as all other claims. It not only takes in the Bacon-Davis Act and the Walsh-Healey Act, but it takes in every conceivable kind of claim or right that an individual may have, anywhere in the United States. That is how broad the bill is. It occurred to me as I read and studied it, in view of the fact that there is absolutely no evidence of any kind that the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act has been affected in any way, that we were going outside and beyond the scope of what we started to do.

I distinctly recall that when this bill was introduced in the Senate we argued here as to whether it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary or to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and the President pro tempore, the distinguished Senator from Michigan, ruled that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, because a constitutional question was involved.

The bill goes far beyond portal-to-portal suits, as I see it. It may be perfectly all right; I am not particularly objecting to it, but it has not been confined to that one point. As I understand, the first bill that was considered by the committee was confined to portal-to-portal suits, just as the bill was originally intended. It is now made to cover a large field, going far beyond where I think it ought to go at this particular time.

Mr. COOPER. I do not want to repeat the argument of the Senator from Missouri. I can only say, however, that following the argument, citation, and quotation given from a decision rendered by Mr. Justice Murphy, I believe that it was pointed out, in the reading of that decision, that if the Congress had the dominant constitutional power to act, then the method which it chose in the exercise of that power was a matter within the discretion of Congress, and it would be sustained.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield so that I may ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Is not the title of the act sufficiently broad to deal with any other act, outside the strictly portal-to-portal suits?

Mr. COOPER. I think the chief purpose of the committee in the formulation of this bill was to reach and to nullify for portal-to-portal activities.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct; but the question is raised to how broad the legislation is. I am asking if the title of the act is not sufficiently broad to include phases of the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act. Is not the title broad enough to comprehend the Bacon-Davis Act?

Mr. COOPER. The committee certainly takes that position.

Mr. WHERRY. Let me ask another question. In the event I desired to offer an amendment which I felt was proper and within constitutional provisions, the absence of facts should not deter me from offering that amendment, and should not be determinative of whether or not it was constitutional? I might offer an amendment in good faith; there would be no malice in it; it would not be a matter of caprice, and if the amendment I wanted to offer, according to my view, would afford relief, certainly the Supreme Court would not hold it to be an act of malice or caprice, if I did not have all the facts to substantiate the amendment; is that not true?

Mr. COOPER. I think it could be offered, I think it could be adopted, I think it could be held constitutional.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator from Nebraska for his interrogation of the Senator from Kentucky. I also thank the latter for his responses.

The bills which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary were mentioned in my presentation Friday. Before reading the pending bill or going into it in detail, I want to do what I said I was going to do, namely, tell the Senate how we went about the preparation of this bill.

In the first place, I have told about our hearings. I think anyone who reads those hearings or any material part of them, or who even looks over the list of witnesses, will realize that we had before us testimony of the highest order.

In the second place, after we had completed the hearings, the subcommittee then went into executive session, that is, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], and I, and we started in to consider what should be the approach. We saw three points before us. One was whether or not the best interests of our country required that the portal-to-portal cases should be wiped out. That was question No. 1.

In the second place, if we came to the conclusion that those claims should be wiped out, would the action Congress might take to reach that objective be violative of the Constitution or within the limits of the Constitution?

In the third place, if we should find that the action to be taken by Congress in nullifying those claims would be within the Constitution, what practical steps should be taken in the drafting of a bill to effectuate that purpose?

We had no special difficulty, Mr. President, with the first of the propositions, namely, whether or not the best interests of our country required that portal-to-portal suits be nullified. We quickly came to the conclusion, after hearing the evidence, which was so strong and convincing that, in our judgment, anyone must have arrived at that conclusion—we came to the conclusion, I say, that the best interests of our country required that these suits be nullified.

In the second place, we took up the question of constitutionality. There, Mr. President, we realized the fact that different minds will differ upon that question. We realized that on the one hand the position could be taken by some that a vested right has become created in each employee affected; that even though the right has been created under statute, it is a vested right, and that the employee has a chose in action, just as much property as dollars and cents in his pocket are property. That is the position that could be taken. Therefore, the fifth amendment, prohibiting the deprivation of property without due process of law, would make unconstitutional any action taken to deprive him of the right to collect. We realized that that proposition would be maintained in the Supreme Court of the United States by anyone seeking to overturn this act of Congress. No criticism is to be indulged against anybody who raises that point in the Court. The Court exists for that purpose, and I think it is a wholesome thing that the validity of this proposed legislation will not be accepted without question, because, after all, we want to know whether or not the legislation is good or bad, and the Court is the body to decide that question.

On the other hand, we realized the strength of the Norman case and the National Carloading case. We heard the evidence of eminent lawyers in whose judgment I, speaking for myself, at any rate, came to have great confidence as I heard them testify. We came to the conclusion, as indicated in our report, that the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, particularly the language of Chief Justice Hughes in the Norman case, gives us the clear right to draw the conclusion that the Court will hold this legislation to be constitutional. It does not give us the clear right to hold that the legislation will not be attacked. It does not give us the undisputed power to prophesy with that keen discernment and prophetic discernment of which the Chief Justice himself speaks in the Norman case, what the holding of the Court will be.

Therefore, Mr. President, Senators will find certain alternative provisions in the bill which are inserted for the reason that, in the event the Court should for any reason hold our effort to wipe out these suits to have been invalid, certain other alternatives shall come into effect which so far as possible will minimize the amounts of recoveries in the portal-to-portal suits.

So, Mr. President, having satisfied ourselves on propositions 1 and 2, the two first questions, we started then to consider how to draw the bill.

As I remember—I made no record at the time and may be in error in the chronology, but I think substantially I am correct—as I remember, the first draft of the bill was prepared by the legislative counsel, Mr. Rice, whom I see on the floor at this moment.

At about that time a gentleman from New York, Mr. Arthur Pettit, a member of the law firm with which Henry L. Stimson is connected, Winthrop, Stimson, Putnam & Roberts, had testified before our committee and had so clearly outlined his views that he impressed me, at any rate, as being a man of great and profound judgment and ability.

At about the same time it appears that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], as I understand, having heard Mr. Pettit testify suggested to him that he write down what he thought should be in the bill and give it to the Senator from Indiana, who had prepared an amendment which was then pending before our committee. Mr. Pettit came to Washington. I do not think he came at my request then, as I recall. He did later, however. He came, and I saw him in my office, as I remember, on the occasion when he came here to present to the Senator from Indiana what he had drawn up. This was after our subcommittee heard all the testimony. I requested Mr. Pettit to sit in with us. He asked me whether or not it would be agreeable to have his associate, Mr. Chanler, of the same law firm, sit in also. Mr. Chanler had testified before the committee. We had received from him an excellent brief. I have not read all of it, but I have read a portion of it. The portion I have read makes me realize that it has been prepared with great ability. Those two gentlemen came down from New York and they sat in my office with the members of the subcommittee. I am not certain whether the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] was present at that time, but at any rate, although he was only an ex officio member of the subcommittee, he, as I previously indicated, gave us great assistance in the preparation of the bill and sat with us and discussed it and worked on it with us. At any rate, Mr. Pettit and Mr. Chanler came. A subsequent draft of the bill was prepared.

At the time of these preliminary drafts of the bill the general thought, as I remember it, of our subcommittee was that we should in effect provide that as to activities occurring at any time during the day, a 24-hour period, there should be no compensability unless under the terms of a contract or in accordance with a custom or practice.

At or about that time we decided to ask to come before us, if they would come, a representative of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Walter Mason, who is not a lawyer, but who came very gladly, and also on a different occasion, Mr. Cotton, assistant counsel of the CIO. Mr. Pressman, with whom we had had previous contacts, was out of the city, I think in Pittsburgh, Pa., on important matters for his clients. We therefore secured the presence of Mr. Cotton, who I think is the next man in rank in the CIO legal department.

Mr. Cotton came and brought with him a lady, a Mrs. Peterson, who is associated with the Amalgamated Clothing Organization, to which reference has been made. They conferred with us in my office. I think the Senator from Kentucky and I were present substantially throughout the conference. I am not certain whether the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] was present at that particular conference. At any rate, the conference occurred with Mr. Cotton and with Mrs. Peterson, and our subcommittee, either all or some of us certainly, including myself.

Mr. Cotton was not in agreement with us on our bill at all, but I want to say that both he and Mrs. Peterson were extremely courteous, and very cooperative in giving us their views and such assistance as they found to be possible. I did not want to bind the CIO or attempt to do so by any bill we might undertake to produce. But, as the Senator from Kentucky has said, they stated they were against the bill. Nevertheless, though they were against it, they showed a fine spirit in giving us their judgment as to different points that arose in the preparation of the bill.

Among other things, one or both of them referred to various illustrations of practices which they thought our bill would make valid by law, which practices they considered improper. I remember that one of them was something along this line: A woman, we will say, is working in a production line where garments are being manufactured. As she sits at her place waiting for the merchandise to come to her to be worked upon—to put on a button or sew on a sleeve, or whatever it may be—there is a break-down for 2 hours in the line ahead of her. The practice for years in that particular plant may have been that the manufacturer would not pay for that time, and that neither by custom nor contract did she have any right to compensation. Mr. Cotton or Mrs. Peterson—or possibly both of them—pointed out that in cases of that type, if we should enact a law such as was proposed, it having been drawn for us, as I have indicated, we would in effect make legal and valid the action of employers who had refused to give compensation to such an employee while waiting for merchandise to come to him.

The conference with these various individuals lasted for 3 or 4 hours. Finally we came to the conclusion—we did not do it at that moment, but very shortly thereafter, although we may have made up our minds during the conference—that instead of making our bill apply to the 24-hour period, around the clock, we would make it apply only to the period preceding the beginning of the normal workday and subsequent to the end of the normal workday—what might be termed the whistle-to-whistle period. So we started to make all activities prior to the beginning of the work day compensable only if so under a contract or custom, and to make all activities after the conclusion of the work day compensable only if so under contract or custom, leaving the broad field of the workday itself, the great bulk of the time, with no new legislation applicable to it. We had the bill drawn in that form. We found great difficulty as we progressed in the definition of the line designating the beginning of the workday. We found equally great difficulty in defining the line at the end of the workday.

If anyone could sit down and draft a bill of this kind, defining those two lines without great difficulty, our committee would have been very glad to have his assistance. At any rate, we finally did so. We drew the bill as to existing claims and as to future claims, applicable only to the period preceding the beginning of the workday and after the conclusion of the workday.

Then we were confronted by these considerations: A gentleman by the name of Finlay, who is associated with the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, I believe, came to Washington and left a memorandum with us, followed by a letter, taking the position pretty generally that if we should not legislate with reference to the shift period, that is to say, between whistle and whistle, we would still leave unattained our objective to wipe out the portal-to-portal suits. For illustration, in connection with lunch time, as I remember, it was alleged in the Mount Clemens case by the employees that they were entitled to compensation from the time they left their work places to the time they reached the cafeteria, and for the time spent in returning. This gentleman pointed out to us that in his judgment there would be such cases, which would still be undisposed of, and that if we adopted the plan of merely legislating as to existing claims with respect to activities before the beginning of the workday and after the end of the workday, in all probability, there would still be left pending in the courts a great mass of suits, and thus we would fail to attain our objective.

So Mr. President, we approached the question again. I do not recall whether or not the last change on our part, back to a form in which we decided to legislate with respect to the whole 24 hours in connection with existing claims, occurred before or after we had reported the bill to the Senate. I am inclined to think that we made our decision afterward, and that the bill was later recommitted. I know that it was recommitted at the request of the subcommittee. I think the occasion for the recommittal was the fact that this point had occurred to us subsequently.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] has a somewhat different recollection. His recollection is that the reason the bill was recommitted was that at a subsequent conference between Mr. Cotton, of the CIO, Mrs. Peterson, and Mr. Abt, counsel for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, they contended that the language in our bill would permit the period of the work-day to be fixed by the employer. I think the recollection of the Senator from Kentucky is correct. One other gentleman, also a lawyer, suggested that point to us.

So regardless of the chronology of this particular phase, we had the bill recommitted, and we decided that the best way and the only practicable way in our judgment to legislate out of existence these portal-to-portal claims was to make the part of our bill which applies to existing claims applicable to the entire 24 hours of the day.

I have gone into this subject at great length because I think it is exceedingly important as showing that Congress, when it legislates to affect the rights of persons other than those who have engaged in portal-to-portal activities, and to affect rights other than those accruing from the performance of portal-to-portal activities, is not acting capriciously or arbitrarily, but within its sound discretion in using what the Congress deems to be the best practical approach to demolishing the portal-to-portal cases. So, Mr. President, we have reported the bill in the form which I have described.

Some time ago the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] made an inquiry as to when the discussion on the bill would occur. I do not now see him in the Chamber.

I inadvertently omitted to mention one other gentleman who was of great assistance to our committee, and I think that his connection with the matter should be known to the Congress. In the course of the testimony before the subcommittee he was a witness. He was Mr. Rufus G. Poole, a lawyer of the city of Washington, who was connected with the preparation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. My recollection is that he informed us that he had written more of it than had any other one individual. Obviously he was exceedingly well informed with respect to it. During his connection with the Department of Labor, he was an assistant in the enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and there went out over his signature 103,000 interpretations or rulings of one type or another. He was not only well informed but was exceedingly willing to help us in any way he could.

I should have mentioned also the point which was made against the bill in the form in which it was when it undertook to provide only with respect to the time after the conclusion of the workday and before the beginning of the workday. It is my recollection that it was with respect to this point that Mr. Poole told us that the language in the bill, in his opinion, would permit an employer to move up the beginning of the workday or move it back in the afternoon so as to make greater and greater areas subject to the act, and that there was no "peg," as he put it, provided in the bill to prevent an employer from taking such action.

I have mentioned Mr. Poole. If I think of anyone else who has rendered material assistance and who should be mentioned, I shall try to do so. I believe I mentioned the fact that Mr. Cotton and Mrs. Peterson came back for a subsequent interview. At that time Mr. Abt, of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, was with them. They were with us about 2 hours. Mr. Mason, of the American Federation of Labor, also came back. He called me later, while we were under great stress in the final preparation of the bill, and when we thought time was of the essence. He asked me if he might come to see me again. I thought the previous conferences indicated that we would not realize any great amount of assistance from a further conference, and therefore I thought it was better if we immediately began to proceed with our work.

I mentioned a moment ago that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] desired to know when we would proceed to discuss the bill. If someone on the minority side will let him know, I shall appreciate it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the senior Senator from Illinois has been sent for.

Mr. DONNELL. I shall proceed with the portion of the bill in which I assume the Senator is not particularly interested. If he is, I can go over it briefly for him when he arrives.

The bill is divided into four parts. The first of these parts, beginning on page 7, is entitled "Findings and Policy." Some one may wonder what has happened to the first six pages. They were contained in the Gwynne bill, H. R. 2157, as enacted by the House of Representatives, and have been stricken out by our committee. The portion beginning in line 5 of page 7 has been substituted in lieu thereof.

Part I, entitled "Findings and Policy," occupies pages 7, 8, 9, and approximately three-fourths of page 10.

Personally I approached the preparation of this part of the bill with somewhat of an antipathy to any such legislative means. Until I arrived in Washington about 2 years ago, as perhaps the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] will remember, I had had some hostility to the idea of recitals at the beginning of bills.

I am still what I euphemistically term "old-fashioned" enough not to be too enthusiastic about it yet. It seems to me that it is better to lay down the law than to have an essay preceding or succeeding a bill. Nevertheless, we were advised and believe that the Supreme Court—perhaps with great propriety—has given great weight to findings and policies set forth in bills. I am not intimating any criticism of the Court in what I have said. It is merely my own personal view. We thought in this case it was particularly important, in view of the fact that we realized that attacks will be made upon the constitutionality of the bill, that we should not fail to use every safeguard to be sure, if we could, to lay the basis for this legislation.

In this connection, we observed that the Fair Labor Standards Act itself contained a finding and declaration of policy. It is in section 2. It covers about 17 lines of printing in Public Law No. 718. Generally speaking, it constitutes a finding, in the first place, that the existence of certain conditions tends to obstruct and burden commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce. In the second place, it declares the policy of the act, through the exercise by Congress of its power to regulate commerce among the several States, to correct, and as rapidly as practicable, to eliminate, the conditions previously referred to in such industries without substantially curtailing employment or earning power.

We made further investigation to see if we were right in regard to the importance of findings and policy, and we found some decisions which I shall not mention unless it is desired that I do so. I shall have to get them and put them into the RECORD a little later.

On Friday last the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] mentioned the fact that a very recent opinion, in the case of United States of America against United Mine Workers and John L. Lewis, decided on March 6, 1947, in itself indicates the influence which statements of findings and policy have upon the Supreme Court. It will be observed by reference to pages 12 and 13 of that decision that the Court says:

> But we need not place entire reliance in this exclusionary rule. Section 2, which declared the public policy of the United States as a guide to the act's interpretation, carries indications as to the scope of the act.

And so forth. Then the Court sets forth that section 2 provides:

> In the interpretation of this act and in determining the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States, as such jurisdiction and authority are herein defined and limited, the public policy of the United States is hereby declared as follows:

Then it recites that under prevailing economic conditions the individual unorganized worker is commonly helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor. Quoting further—

> Therefore, the following definitions of, and limitations upon, the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States are hereby enacted.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire section be placed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> SEC. 2. In the interpretation of this act and in determining the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States, as such jurisdiction and authority are herein defined and limited, the public policy of the United States is hereby declared as follows:
> Whereas under prevailing economic conditions, developed with the aid of governmental authority for owners of property to organize in the corporate and other forms of ownership association, the individual unorganized worker is commonly helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor, and thereby to obtain acceptable terms and conditions of employment, wherefore, though he should be free to decline to associate with his fellows, it is necessary that he have full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, to negotiate the terms and conditions of his employment, and that he shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; therefore, the following definitions of, and limitations upon, the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States are hereby enacted.

So, Mr. President, I submit that notwithstanding the normal reluctance of at least one lawyer to such findings, under the holdings of the Court declarations of findings and policy do have weight, and perhaps properly so.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. May we have an understanding that at a later time the Senator will also include in his remarks the Supreme Court decisions to which he referred, because I think it is rather vital when we come to write a definition of congressional intent for subsequent interpretation of a statute by the Supreme Court.

Mr. DONNELL. I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon, and I shall comply with it.

The findings and policy as set forth in the bill begin with the statement that—

> The Congress hereby finds that the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (52 Stat. 1060; 29 U. S. C., ch. 8), as amended, has been interpreted judicially—

Mr. President, I may say that in the earlier draft and drafts of the bill we had the words "and administratively," but we have determined to strike out the words "and administratively," and now are referring solely to judicial interpretations of the act—

> so as to require employers to pay compensation thereunder for activities which were not commonly understood by employees and employers in accordance with practice, custom, understanding, or agreement to be work, thereby creating wholly unexpected liabilities, immense in amount and retroactive in operation, upon employers throughout the country for compensation for such activities and for an additional equal amount as liquidated damages and attorney's fees—

I may say to the Senator from Oregon that, upon reflection, it may be that there was only one additional decision. I am not quite certain whether there was one or whether there were two. However that may be, we shall put in the RECORD all such material.

I may also say at this point, in interpolation, that I think the Senate will find that in these recitals of fact there is either evidence or, to my mind, sound judgment by way of inference from the evidence in the case and from the common knowledge of the Members of the Senate, to justify every word in these findings and policy.

I continue to read from them:

with the results that, if the act as so interpreted or claims arising under such interpretations were permitted to stand—

(1) the credit of many employers would be seriously impaired.

Mr. President, certainly a reflection upon the evidence will convince anyone of that fact.

I read further:

(2) Payment of such liabilities would bring about the financial ruin of many employers and seriously impair the capital resources of many other employers and would thereby result in drastically reducing industrial operations, curtailing employment and the earning power of employees, and substantially burdening commerce and substantially obstructing the free flow of goods in commerce contrary to the purposes of said act.

I may say we put in the word "substantially," not as a mere accident, but because we think it important to point out that there would not be any mere trivial interference or obstruction, but that there would be a substantial obstruction to commerce and to the free flow of goods in commerce and a substantial burden upon commerce.

I read further:

(3) Employees, having engaged in such activities with the understanding and belief that they were already fully compensated therefor by their agreed rates of pay, would receive windfall payments for activities performed by them without any expectation of reward, and for liquidated damages and attorney's fees; (4) the Public Treasury would be deprived of large sums of revenues and public finances would be seriously deranged by claims against the Public Treasury on war contracts and for enormous amounts of refunds of taxes paid in prior years; (5) the cost to the Government of goods and services heretofore and hereafter purchased by its various departments and agencies would be unreasonably increased; and (6) employers and employees would be unable to determine, without extensive, expensive, and prolonged litigation to final judgment in a court of last resort, the amounts owing to employees for such activities previously, now, or hereafter engaged in by employees, and would in many cases be unable to make voluntary settlement, compromise, release, or adjustment of claims of employees arising out of such activities, and there would result the promotion of increasing demands for payment to employees for engaging in activities no compensation for which had been contemplated, by either the employer or employee at the time they were engaged in, to be paid.

I call the attention of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] to the fact that the point in our minds there in regard to the promotion of increasing demands for payment to employees for engaging in activities no compensation for which was contemplated was the particular illustration which came from the witness whom the Senator from New Mexico was so kind as to bring to us from Carlsbad, N. Mex. That witness testified in regard to the pendency of suits for millions of dollars, part of the liability being for riding, in busses not owned by the company, 12 miles from Carlsbad to the location of the mine, during which trip the employees, as I have indicated, in some instances, at least, either read or slept.

I read further from the statement of findings and policy contained in the bill:

Among the results of such conditions being (a) the stirring up of champertous practices and congestion of courts, (b) extended and continuous uncertainty on the part of industry, both employer and employee, as to the financial condition of productive establishments with consequent halting of expansion and development, retardation of employment, the infliction of hampering restraints and restrictions on commerce and on the development thereof, (c) Nation-wide industrial conflict, unrest and disputes between employees and employers and between employees and employees, and (d) gross inequality of competitive conditions between employers and between industries, thereby interfering substantially with the free flow of goods in commerce, seriously and adversely affecting the revenues of the Federal, State, and local Governments and injuriously affecting the national prosperity and general welfare of the United States of America.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. As I understand the distinguished Senator, these recitals of policy were made to help show that the proposed legislation is constitutional. Is that correct?

Mr. DONNELL. They were designed to show the constitutional basis for legislation of this type; namely, the fact that interference with the flow of commerce and grave burdens upon commerce exist and will continue to exist unless the portal-to-portal suits are eliminated.

Mr. McFARLAND. Does the Senator from Missouri contend as to the first recital, for instance, that because the credit of many employers would be seriously impaired, that is a basis for wiping out a debt, if one exists?

Mr. DONNELL. I should say that the impairment of the credit of many employers all over the United States is certainly a strong incident in the burden on commerce which the pendency of these suits now presents. Yes, sir; I say that.

Mr. McFARLAND. In that case, would the simple fact that a hardship is presented be regarded as a basis for wiping out such an obligation? Could not that be used as the basis for wiping out all obligations which a man might have?

Mr. DONNELL. No, Mr. President; the Senator overlooks the fact that he has picked out merely one of the recitals.

In the first place, even that one recital would be sufficient, because if the credit of many employers throughout the United States were to be seriously impaired, as undoubtedly the evidence in this matter shows will result and is resulting, it might well be that that one impairment, if widespread, such as is the case in this instance, would amount to a serious burden on commerce which would prevent its expansion, bring about retardation of employment, bring about a decrease in employment, and bring about great injury to the national welfare, and consequently would be a burden upon commerce.

But, Mr. President, the Senator has not commented upon the fact that, in addition to that one recital, there are set forth in the other recitals numerous facts as to other cumulative results and matters; and the result is that the clear and unmistakable conclusion must be that flowing from these suits is a burden of a substantially important nature upon commerce.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. I merely mentioned those matters because of the constitutional question involved, the question of the right of Congress to legislate away any existing right an individual may have.

Mr. DONNELL. I do not know whether the Senator was present during the discussion of the Norman case this afternoon. Was he present at that time?

Mr. McFARLAND. I do not believe I heard that discussion.

Mr. DONNELL. That is the gold clause case, and then there was the national carloading case, and the Louisville and Nashville case. In all those cases, as I read them, the court takes the view that when Congress is legislating in a field over which it has jurisdiction, any contract made by any person with relation to that field has within it, as Chief Justice Hughes said, a congenital infirmity, and, as he subsequently explained in the Norman case, a person so contracting does so subject to the right of Congress later to wipe out the existence of the obligation.

Mr. McFARLAND. That would not be because the liability would be a hardship, would it?

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator does not seem to get the point, or I have not made it clear to him.

The point is that all these various facts I have set forth, and which have been set forth by our committee of findings and policy, show beyond peradventure of doubt that the existence and maintenance of these suits creates a substantial burden upon commerce. The Fair Labor Standards Act was passed in order to prevent burden and obstruction of commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce. It seems to me very clear that we have a right to show that the maintenance of these suits imposes a burden upon commerce, thereby showing that within the field of commerce the facts are such as to lead any prudent Congress to enact legislation along the line suggested in the bill before us.

Mr. McFARLAND. I understand the contention of the Senator, but the point I am trying to make is that perhaps what he presents, instead of helping to bolster up the legislation, might be tearing it down.

Mr. DONNELL. I cannot think that the Senator has understood the language. The language is that if the act is permitted to be interpreted in the manner in which it has been interpreted, if the claims arising under it are permitted to stand, one of the results would be the serious impairment of the credit of many employers, of course resulting in the retardation of development, in many instances, and interference in the carrying on of normal activities may readily result in decreasing the number of employees, and obviously putting a burden upon commerce.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask a question of the majority leader?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I merely desired to ask how long it was intended that the Senate continued in session this evening.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it was my hope that we might continue in session up to 5:30 o'clock, but the Senator from Missouri has spoken at substantial length, and if he desires to stop at this time, it is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. DONNELL. I am perfectly willing to continue until 5:30.

Mr. WHITE subsequently said: Mr. President, since the Senator from New Mexico inquired of me a few moments ago about the purpose as to recess, I have talked with the Senator from Missouri. He advises me that he will not be able to conclude his remarks between now and half-past five, and that he is willing to yield the floor if it may be understood that he will be recognized tomorrow on the resumption of the session, so that he may complete his remarks.

Mr. President, I make that unanimous-consent request.

Mr. LUCAS. Reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the Senator from Missouri how much longer he thinks it will take tomorrow for him to analyze the bill, now that he is into the main part of it?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, of course it is very difficult to anticipate how many questions there will be. I think if I were uninterrupted—which I do not think is the way to proceed with such a bill, however, I think from now on I ought to yield to interruptions—I think if I were uninterrupted I could go through the bill and analyze it in the course of three-quarters of an hour, or about that. With interruptions, explanations, and so forth, it may take considerably more than that. I want to try to explain everything I can.

Mr. LUCAS. I anticipate there will be interruptions, because as I see it, the Senator is now down to the bill itself, and I think many Senators on both sides of the aisle will desire to interrogate him upon the legalistic phases of it.

Mr. DONNELL. I think that is perfectly proper. I think that is quite right. It should be done.

Mr. LUCAS. I rather imagine it may take the Senator most of the afternoon, if he does not proceed any faster than he has proceeded in the last 2 days.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate assembles tomorrow, Tuesday, the Senator from Missouri may be recognized to conclude his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, unless the Senator from Missouri desires to proceed further, I shall move an executive session.

Mr. DONNELL. Very well.

QUESTIONNAIRE ON GRECIAN RELIEF PROPOSAL

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I should like to make an announcement regarding the work of the Committee on Foreign Relations in connection with the pending Greek relief proposal.

At the recent Republican conference I suggested to all Senators present that I was keenly anxious that in this instance there should be developed, in public, all possible information bearing upon the issue, because I recognize that there is great lack of understanding and lack of adequate information regarding the subject. I suggested to my colleagues on this side of the aisle that I proposed to prepare a questionnaire, to which I invited them all to contribute, which questionnaire I intended to submit to the State Department for categorical answers.

I immediately sent a letter to the able senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the distinguished minority leader, giving him the same information, and inviting Senators on the other side of the aisle to participate in the questionnaire. Unfortunately, for reasons which we all understand, the Senator from Kentucky has been absent, and I find today that my letter has been upon his desk without attention. I should like to say to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle that I am very anxious to pursue this questionnaire idea in the present instance to a total disclosure in response to any questions which may be in any Senator's mind in regard to this gravely important issue which we shortly will confront.

I hope to conclude the questionnaire by Wednesday evening, and I would say to Senators on the other side, as I have said to my colleagues on this side of the aisle, that I shall welcome from any of them any questions which they care to suggest, to be included in the questionnaire which will be submitted to the State Department for public reply.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Did the Senator say that the questionnaire should be in by Wednesday night of this week?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. Is it the intention of the Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to hold public hearings on this issue after the replies are in?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Most certainly, but it seemed to me that in this instance we should go to somewhat extraordinary lengths to be sure that all the information is developed which is required by any Member of the Senate in connection with his determination of his judgment.

Mr. LUCAS. I presume that some officer of the State Department, or some other agency of the Government will be requested to answer the questions which may be propounded by Senators.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I intend to mobilize the entire questionnaire by the middle of the week, and submit it to the State Department, with request for a written answer to every question. It occurs to me that the publication of these questions and answers will go far toward illuminating the subject for the benefit of both Congress and the country.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator expect to hold hearings before this week shall expire?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No.

Mr. HATCH. Is it the desire to have the questions submitted by Wednesday night?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. We will have the full day Wednesday?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. I notice on our desks also the hearings of the committee on the international refugee question. Will the Senator advise me whether he has hope of taking that up?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I had hoped we might perhaps slip that in when there was some happy interlude in the debate on the pending bill. Inasmuch as the committee is unanimous in the report, I had hoped that there would be little controversy about it, and that we could proceed with it rather promptly. There still seems to be some argument over the appropriate language in the amendment dealing with immigration. Until that is straightened out, which I hope will be tomorrow, nothing can be done about the matter, but as soon as possible I shall ask the Senate to give attention to the bill, because this is one of the measures upon which prompt action is very acutely necessary.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to express my complete accord with what the Senator has said, and I hope opportunity will later arise when the matter can be taken up. Like the Senator from Michigan, I see no reason for long debate on it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, and withdrawing a nomination, which nominations were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable report of a nomination was submitted:

By Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Edward Mount Webster, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the Federal Communications Commission for the unexpired term of 7 years from July 1, 1942.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Gordon R. Clapp, of Tennessee, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. WHITE. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations to the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all the nominations to the Atomic Energy Commission be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, they will be passed over.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Carroll Miller, of Pennsylvania, to be an Interstate Commerce Commissioner for a term expiring December 31, 1953.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Harry A. McDonald, of Michigan, to be a member for the remainder of the term expiring June 5, 1951.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Henry Earl Cook, of Ohio, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation for the unexpired term of 6 years from September 6, 1945.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James R. Wade to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 45, with headquarters at St. Louis, Mo.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That completes the executive calendar.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that the President be immediately notified of all nominations this day confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

RECESS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if there is no further business for the afternoon, I move, as in legislative session, that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 18, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 17 (legislative day of February 19), 1947:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 17, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father's God, we wait on Thee, of whom we are fragments and from whom all virtues flow. Grant unto us the spirit of worship and true godliness. O keep us together in the bonds of sympathetic understanding, that we may see our duty and respond with signal devotion to perform it. As the Golden Rule is in our memories, constrain us to follow it in our deeds. Inspire us to heed its mandate in the Christian conscience of our people, ever loyal to the highest principles of that manhood and womanhood as revealed by Thy witnesses, who, sorrowing yet rejoicing, poor yet making many rich, having nothing yet possessing all things, have lived and died for the love of Christ and for the salvation of man. Their shadow was love and their steps were a benediction. O Saviour of the ages, hear our prayer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, March 13, 1947, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 220. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to convey to American Telephone & Telegraph Co. an easement for communication purposes in certain lands situated in Virginia and Maryland; and

S. 221. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to grant and convey to the Virginia Electric & Power Co., a perpetual easement in two strips of land comprising portions of the Norfolk Navy Yard, Portsmouth, Va., and for other purposes.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON WILDLIFE CONSERVATION

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 21, Rept. No. 151), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That effective from January 3, 1947, the Special Committee To Investigate All Matters Pertaining to the Replacement and Conservation of Wildlife is authorized to continue the investigation begun under authority of House Resolution 237 of the Seventy-third Congress, continued under authority of House Resolution 44 of the Seventy-fourth Congress, House Resolution 11 of the Seventy-fifth Congress, House Resolution 65 of the Seventy-sixth Congress, House Resolution 49 of the Seventy-seventh Congress, House Resolution 20 of the Seventy-eighth Congress, and House Resolution 75 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, and for such purposes said committee shall have the same power and authority as that conferred upon it by said House Resolution 237 of the Seventy-third Congress, and shall report to the House as soon as practicable, but not later than January 3, 1949, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations for necessary legislation.

AMENDING THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION ACT

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 145, Rept. No. 152), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 2535) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

PROCUREMENT OF SUPPLIES AND SERVICES BY THE WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 146, Rept. No. 153), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1366) to facilitate procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall not exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 30 minutes on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, at 8 o'clock tonight, our time, over the National Broadcasting System there will be broadcast a very interesting story of the life of Luther Burbank, this being his birth month. Lionel Barrymore will be the one to narrate the story of his life. I ask unanimous consent that this announcement may appear in the RECORD at this point and that I may then revise and extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a radio broadcast on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOODRUFF asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, on the opening day of the Eightieth Congress I introduced H. R. 13, providing for the completion of the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project under the terms of the 1941 agreement between the United States and Canada and the Federal-New York State power accord of 1933. My bill is substantially the same as Senate Joint Resolution 104 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, which was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on June 13, 1946.

As an American interested in the development of the resources and wealth of our country and a Member of the House from the Thirty-fourth District of New York, I strongly urge the passage of H. R. 13 so that this important project can be completed. I remind you that President Truman and Gov. Thomas E. Dewey strongly advocate the completion of the St. Lawrence project, as have the Presidents and New York State Governors of this generation. Last month Secretary of State Marshall recommended to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations approval of it by this session of Congress.

In my opinion, there are at least four important and compelling reasons why Congress should now give its approval to the completion of the St. Lawrence project. In the first place, the St. Lawrence seaway will result in greatly reduced transportation costs for both producers and consumers in an area inhabited by over 40,000,000 people. It will open up to ocean traffic the great agricultural and industrial area of the Great Lakes area.

In the second place, the project will result in the generation of a tremendous amount of electricity—equal to the 1944 output of all the hydroelectric development of the entire TVA—without any direct cost to the people of the United States as a whole.

In the third place, the testimony of our military and naval leaders is clear that the St. Lawrence project will be a great contribution to our national defense and security.

Finally, the St. Lawrence project will provide jobs for thousands of workers and promote our domestic and foreign trade. It is one of the greatest public improvements now available for development in the United States.

My bill is now pending before the Rivers and Harbors Subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works. I urge that consideration be given to the St. Lawrence project at an early date. If the authorization can now be voted we can apportion the spending over a period of the next few years consistent with the demands of the budget and the national economy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LECOMPTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD DIGEST

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under Public Law 601, the Congressional Reorganization Act, the Joint Committee on Printing is directed to make arrangements for the printing of a Congressional Digest under the Supervision of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House. Members of the House will be glad to know that this Congressional Digest covering the proceedings of both the Senate and House in condensed form will appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a supplement beginning with the RECORD of today, which, of course, will come out tomorrow morning. The supplement will be four pages long and will be somewhat different in appearance from the balance of the RECORD in that it will be printed on a two-column page instead of three columns. The type will be much larger and more easily read. The staff has already been assembled to compile the Digest. There will be references to page numbers where those who desire to read the complete proceedings may find the subject matter.

We hope Members will withhold judgment for a few days until the Digest is in its final approved form.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BUFFETT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 30 minutes on the subject of how American intervention in Greece plays into Stalin's hands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

[Mrs. BOLTON addressed the House. Her remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

WORLD FEDERATION OF TRADE UNIONS

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, according to an article by Fred W. Perkins in the Washington Daily News of March 14, 1947, page 26, Louis Saillant, general secretary of the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions, is to leave for Japan on the United States Army plane. He is going there as a part of a delegation, including N. P. Tarason, secretary of the Russian Central Council of Trade Unions.

It is to the credit of General MacArthur that he refused permission to this delegation to make its so-called inspection.

Let me cite the record of this Mr. Saillant, in whose behalf Secretary of War Patterson has rejected the decision of General MacArthur.

Louis Saillant has a record of close cooperation with the French Communist Party. He attended the seventy-fifth birthday celebration in honor of the French Communist leader, Marcel Cachin—Humanité, September 21, 1944; he attended a meeting of the Communist Party in the Paris region, according to Humanite of October 28, 1944; and spoke before the tenth congress of the Communist Party of France, acording to Humanité of June 20, 1945. He defended Maurice Thorez, convicted deserter and Communist leader. The New York Times of October 6, 1945, page 9, characterizes him as one who "has supported Communist views more often than Socialist views in French politics."

I serve notice upon Secretary of War Patterson that he will be held directly responsible for any difficulties created for General MacArthur in his splendid work in Japan by this delegation which he has permitted to enter that theater.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'HARA]?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, on this St Patrick's Day I take this opportunity to wish my colleagues the very best "Top o' the Mornin' " and to assure you that the sun shines bright in Glocca Morra.

It is a high privilege and pleasure on my part, as a true descendent of Erin, to extend to you greetings. St. Patrick's Day is and always will be a day of national importance and I have it on the authority of our good friend Joe O'Brien that the O'Haras and the O'Briens on the Republican side of the aisle are true descendents of the Kings of Ireland and the Kearneys, Keefe, the Welches, the Devitts, the Brophys, Gavins, Gallaghers, Murrays, and the Maloneys are their captains. We welcome such recruits as the O'Konskis. We acclaim the affection we have for the O'Briens and the O'Tooles of the other side of the aisle, and we treat with tender consideration the Nortons, the Philbins, the Rileys, the Rooneys, the Kelleys, the Kennedys, Keoghs and Kildays, the Delaneys, the Monroneys, the Lynches—yes, the Republican Irish with affection greet the McCormacks of Boston and all of the "Macks," Scotch and Irish; the McConnells, the McCowens, the McDonoughs, the McDowells, the McGarveys, the McGregors, the McMahons; not to say also the Maddens, the Mahons, the Martins, the Fallons, the Feighans, the Flannagans, the Fogartys, and the Folgers, the Bradleys, the Corbetts, the Byrne and the Byrnes.

On this day on no less authority than the Kirwans and the Horans I am assured that the Sabaths, the Blooms, the Lesinskis, the Knutsons, the Muhlenbergs, and the Marcantonios, and from the Abernathys to the Zimmermans, will be a wearin' o' the green.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to the gentleman from Wisconsin talking about juvenile delinquency. There is just one answer to juvenile delinquency and that lies in the home. What we have done through the years is relinquish our control over the children. We have passed laws that school teachers could not discipline them. As a matter of fact, the children today are just free lances in the world. This is not an old maid talking or somebody who never had any children. I raised eight of my own and I took four others out of homes. Some of them I had for years. I had 10 or more at the table for 12 years. They are all married and have established homes of their own except one. None of them has ever been in any trouble. They are all respected and I am proud of them. If the parents will manage their children and give them a licking when they need it; and when the school teacher gives them a licking, give them another one when they get home, you will not have so much juvenile delinquency.

If children are taught to respect authority in the home by parents who command and demand authority, they will respect law, order, and society outside.

They need to be taken to Sunday school and church, not to be sent. My, how things have changed. When I was a boy and a neighbor came to our farm and asked for a couple of boys to help thresh, father said yes or no. Now when I go out for help, father generally says, "Well, I don't know where the boys are; if you can find them they might work for you." Let us be honest about this thing. Children are not born bad.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WADSWORTH asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter by Herbert J. Strong as printed in the New York Times of March 13.

Mr. SHAFER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article entitled "Communist Fronts."

Mr. FORAND asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. ALBERT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix and include a resolution from the southeastern district of the Oklahoma Educational Association.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix and include an editorial.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix and include a letter from a constituent.

Mr. KEFAUVER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix in two instances, in one to include excerpts from an address by Senator TOBEY, and in the other to include a speech Mr. KEFAUVER made recently.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and to include an editorial from the New York Times.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

[Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts addressed the House. Her remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes today at the conclusion of other special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

[Mr. PHILBIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include as a part thereof a copy of a bill I introduced, a statement that I made, and also comparative tables to show the variances between the so-called Knutson plan, the present law, and the Forand plan of taxation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

[Mr. FORAND addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CAMP asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Jackson (Ga.) Progress-Argus.

Mr. ROONEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article by Vincent Sheen.

TAX EXEMPTION

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FEIGHAN] may be permitted to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, on last Thursday, I introduced H. R. 2541, which provides for a $500 tax exemption for the benefit of one who pays the burial expenses of a dependent.

This is a bill where so little relief will mean so much. For example, when death strikes a member of a poor man's family, and the parent has to borrow a sum of probably $500 or more to pay the funeral expenses, the parent is faced with a financial burden which may take many, many months to repay. It is then that our Government should allow a $500 tax exemption to relieve, in a small measure, the expenses incurred at such a time.

The average man with a salary of $2,000 or $2,500 per year will always be grateful to the Government for such consideration in his days of sorrow.

It is my hope that the Ways and Means Committee will report this bill favorably so that all members may have an opportunity to approve this measure, which would bring succor to so many people when they are in need.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a radio address.

Mr. BARTLETT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the San Francisco Chronicle.

Mr. BRYSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD on the subject of the school-lunch program and include a resolution from the General Assembly of South Carolina.

Mr. MURDOCK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. SMATHERS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the New York Times.

Mr. HOFFMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include excerpts.

Mr. BRADLEY of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a short editorial from the Long Beach Argus.

SUGAR CONTROLS

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the House Banking and Currency Committee has favorably reported House Joint Resolution 146, which calls for the removal of all sugar controls on October 31 of this year This is an invitation to speculators and connivers to hoard the short supply available against the termination date, 6 months away, after which they may skyrocket prices and clean up a fortune at the expense of the American people. President Joseph F. Abbott, of the American Sugar Refining Co., sounded the warning in the New York Times on March 11, 1947:

> Reporting on operations last year of the American Sugar Refining Co., Joseph F. Abbott, president, informed stockholders yesterday that while the company opposed Government price and rationing controls as a peacetime measure, the sudden elimination of the present wartime sugar-control program undoubtedly would cause substantial price increases and a scramble for available supplies.
> Prompt action is necessary, Mr. Abbott contended, to prevent another "boom and bust" situation such as that after the First World War, when prices skyrocketed and then collapsed because of the absence of an orderly decontrol program.

The elephant always remembers, but the Republicans always forget. And I predict that 2 years from now millions of Americans will say "Amen" to the late lamented Republican slogan, "Had enough?"

AID TO THE MINING OF STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MINERALS

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, in these critical times we must look to national defense, and one of the best means of doing so is to encourage the mining industry so far as strategic and critical minerals and metals are concerned.

There is legislation now pending, which will come to our attention, having the effect of continuing the premium price payment on certain strategic metals. I call this to the attention of the Congress now and will expand on it somewhat later. In view of the fact that a few days ago we passed the so-called Patterson bill which suspends the collection of the 4 cents per pound excise duty on copper for a period of 2 years, as the bill passed the House, we must now take counterbalancing steps to encourage the mining industry in this country.

In expressing my determined opposition on March 12 to the Patterson bill which provided for suspension of the 4-cent-per-pound excise duty on foreign copper I did so because I thought such a move to be adverse to our national security. Of course, I was pleased that day that the original Patterson bill providing for outright repeal of those duties, was not reported to the House. Also I was pleased that the bill which was reported to the House, providing for suspension of duties for a 3-year period was amended to suspend duties only for a 2-year period. Nevertheless, I think the bill passed by the House on March 12 is in the long run dangerous to national security. It would have been far better had the Congress given more consideration to encouraging domestic production of copper instead of being chiefly concerned with getting cheaper raw copper for domestic manufactures. Of course, I want postwar demand supplied adequately but I am more anxious to see an industry encouraged on which our national security rests so completely.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday next after disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk and at the conclusion of any special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute at this time and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

[Mr. HOFFMAN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that our colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL] be given an indefinite leave of absence on account of death in his family.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that our colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL] be given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in the Capital Times paying tribute to our late Governor of Wisconsin, Mr. Goodland.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

THE LATE JOSHUA L. JOHNS

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I announce to the House the untimely death of Joshua L. Johns, a former distinguished Member of this body. Joshua Johns ably represented the Eighth Wisconsin Congressional District, which I am now honored to serve, from 1939 to 1943. His passing will bring sorrow to the hearts of his former colleagues and to those of us who were privileged to know him well.

Joshua Johns was born in the small Wisconsin town of Eagle, Richland County, on February 27, 1881. After attending public schools in Richland Center, he entered the University of Chattanooga in Tennessee. Upon his graduation, he entered Yale University, receiving his law degree from that school in 1907.

His schooling complete, he began a career which was as diversified as it was distinguished.

Farmer, lawyer, and businesman, he, nevertheless, found time to serve his State and Nation well when duty called. He served ably on the staff of the Governor of Wisconsin in 1928 and he received a signal national honor when he was named president of Kiwanis International in 1933. His public-service career was climaxed when he was elected to the House of Representatives in 1938 and returned again in 1940. Those Members who knew him here were deeply impressed with his knowledge, his industry, and his devotion to duty.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I am sure that the Members on our side who served with Mr. Johns join the gentleman from Wisconsin in the sentiment he has expressed. Personally, I was extremely fond of him. He was a man of integrity, courage, and ability, and his death is a keen personal loss to me.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman.

My district, the State of Wisconsin, and the Nation will mourn the death of this devoted public servant. I know that I can speak for the membership of this body in extending heartfelt sympathies to his widow and family in this time of their great bereavement.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have the privilege of extending their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the death of Mr. Johns.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I join with my other colleagues in expressing regret over the sudden death of our former colleague and friend, Joshua L. Johns, of Green Bay, Wis.

I shall never forget Mr. Johns and the many kind acts he performed in my behalf. When I was sworn in as a Member of this body, on September 15, 1941 Mr. Johns, then a Member of this House, escorted me to the well where the oath of office was administered by Speaker RAYBURN. From that time until the day he left the Congress we were intimate friends. I often went to his office for counsel and advice. He was always kindly and courteous, even though he was extremely busy.

This past week Wisconsin has lost two of its outstanding citizens in the passing of Gov. Walter S. Goodland and now in the death of our beloved friend, Joshua L. Johns. This is a distinct loss to our great State.

I join with my other colleagues in extending deepest sympathy to the members of his family who survive. They can take just pride in the fact that Mr. Johns served his State and his Nation unselfishly at all times.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, there is little that I can add to the tribute paid by our colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] of the Eighth District. Everyone that knew Joshua Johns knows that he attained his position in life through his own efforts. He was not born with any more privileges than any other American child is born with. Joshua Johns had the ambition and the integrity to go forward, and he ended up as a Member of this great body. Personally I shall always recall him as one of my very close friends. Though I never knew him until I came to Washington, I can assure you that there was seldom a morning that 7:15 did not find Joshua Johns in his office. I never have observed a more sincere public servant than was Joshua Johns.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I should like to add my tribute to that which has so fittingly been paid to Josh Johns. It happened that I knew Josh before either of us came to Congress. At that time he was international president of Kiwanis International and I was serving as district governor of the Minnesota-North and South Dakota district. I had an opportunity to study his high-minded principles when he held that high office. I watched his work with great interest in Congress, where he rapidly developed into one of the outstanding Members of what was then the Republican minority.

As just one illustration of the leadership capacity of Josh Johns, I think it is interesting to recall that when he came to Congress he created what was called the Capitol Hill Kiwanis Club. Twice a month about 35 or 40 of us met regularly down in the Speaker's dining room in a little Kiwanis session. That interesting little movement lasted all the time Josh Johns was here, under his leadership and under his guidance. It has since gone the way of all flesh, but it does illustrate in just a small way that great aptitude for leadership which Josh Johns manifested all through his life. I join his colleagues in the Congress in mourning his passing and extending sympathy to his family on their bereavement.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman from South Dakota.

Wisconsin has, within a few days, lost two great statesmen, Joshua Johns, our former colleague, and Gov. Walter S. Goodland. Joshua Johns demonstrated that one of humble beginnings can end up at the top of the ladder if he has the initiative and the desire to work to that end.

To Mrs. Johns, and to his two sons, we extend our sincere sympathy in their hour of need.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. VAN ZANDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article, the Tanning Industry Is Vitally Affected by Reciprocal Trade Agreements.

Mr. MUNDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extracts from an article he has written on the subject What Is Republican Policy?

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I agree fully with the gentleman who spoke earlier that home and parental control play a tremendous part in the lives of children and affect very greatly the question of juvenile delinquency. Religion also affects the lives of our children tremendously, and so does the school. Having served 9½ years as a district judge and having dealt with these problems rather intimately, I recall that statistics show that in 1775 in this great Nation of ours 100 percent emphasis was given to moral teaching, to honesty, integrity, courage, and things of that kind, in our school books. Now that has vanished to the point where there is almost no teaching along that line in our school text books. During that time the average age of criminals, if I recall the statistics correctly, has been reduced from 35 to 21 years.

I remember when I was a kid we had memory gems in our spellers and other school books, and I recall one that went like this:

Howe'er it be, it seems to me,
'Tis only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we as citizens should give a little more attention to what is taught in our school readers, our spellers, and other textbooks.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SADOWSKI asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in four instances and to include in each certain articles.

Mr. DONOHUE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a radio talk given by Mr. George E. Reedy over Station WOL.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a radio address.

A CHALLENGE TO COMMUNISM

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if we are going to challenge the spread of communism in Greece and Turkey, we had better make it a full dress affair and challenge it all along the line beginning here on Capitol Hill.

We should begin in the House Office Building, the Senate Office Building, the Supreme Court Building, and the Library of Congress, and go on down to the War Department and the Navy Department, and all other branches of this Government—and especially the Justice Department, where a certain bunch of Reds or "pinks" have spent years persecuting the white gentiles of this country—and especially the white people of the Southern States.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to challenge communism in Europe, let us go to western Europe and start in Poland and Germany, and put a stop to certain elements persecuting those people who are now unable to defend themselves. Let us make peace with the German people and line them up on our side, if we are going into this battle royal throughout the world.

Then we will have a force that can help us if the worst comes to the worst and we have to sustain our contention at the point of the bayonet.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

NATIONAL ARCHIVES OF THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 1350) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a National Archives of the United States Government, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when this bill was called up on the last Consent Calendar day, it was pointed out that the report was defective in that it did not comply with the rules of the House. Apparently, that defect has not yet been corrected. So far as I know, there is no opposition to the bill itself but to make certain that the committees reporting these bills do observe the rules to the extent of pointing out the changes in existing law, I must again ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

RAISING ALLOWANCES AND WAGES ON VETERANS' TRAINING PROGRAM

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 246) to raise the ceilings on wages and allowances payable to veterans undergoing training on the job, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this legislation falls in the same category as referred to by the gentleman from New York. From what little information we have before us, I understand that it will involve a cost of some $200,000,000. May I ask the author of the bill to explain the purposes of it?

H. R. 246 does not increase subsistence allowance being paid to veterans in institutional or on-the-job training. The subsistence rate of $65 for a veteran without dependent and $90 for a veteran with one or more dependents remains the same. The only thing H. R. 246 does is to increase the amount a veteran may receive when combining subsistence allowance and earnings for productive labor. The present ceiling is $175 per month for a veteran without dependents and $200 for a veteran with dependents.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIMBLE. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. This is to raise the ceiling somewhat over the amount which was allowed last year, $175 for a single man and $200 for a married man. This bill raises the ceiling to $250 for a single man and $325 to $350 for a married man. It was considered by the committee that the men could not carry on with the job training unless this was done. The American Legion had a bill which removed the ceilings entirely, which bill I introduced. This is a modified bill which was introduced by the gentleman from New York, General KEARNEY. The bill I introduced was defeated 14 to 11. This bill finally passed the committee unanimously. I have asked the Rules Committee to grant a rule. A very erroneous impression has gone out that the bill would cost a billion dollars. That is very untrue. General Bradley sent a letter to me and in that letter he stated that the bil' would cost $149,688,000. I think that estimate is high.

If the gentleman is going to object, I suggest that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I am not sure that I will object. I am asking for information. There is no report from the Bureau of the Budget. I find no report from General Bradley. It is a confusing situation.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the letter which General Bradley sent to me be inserted as a part of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington D. C., February 27, 1947.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
Chairman, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. ROGERS: Further reference is made to your request of February 26, 1947, for a report on the estimated cost of H. R. 246, Eightieth Congress, a bill to raise the ceilings on wages and allowances payable to veterans undergoing training on the job, and for other purposes, reported by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs with amendments.

Under this bill the ceiling provisions of paragraph 6 of part VIII of Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a), as amended by Public Law 679, Seventy-ninth Congress, governing the payment of subsistence allowances, would be amended by providing a ceiling of $250 per month instead of $175 for a veteran without a dependent, of $325 per month instead of $200 for a veteran with one dependent, and of $350 per month instead of $200 for a veteran with two or more dependents. It further provides that only so much of the compensation as is derived from productive labor based on the standard workweek for the particular trade or industry, exclusive of overtime, shall be used in computing the rate of allowances payable under paragraph 6.

It is estimated that the increased cost of the ceiling provisions, as proposed to be amended by H. R. 246, as reported, assuming no acceleration in enrollment, would be $149,688,000 for fiscal year 1948. If the bill should be enacted into law prior to the beginning of the fourth quarter of fiscal 1947 (April 1, 1947), an additional sum of $40,603,000 would be required for the fiscal year 1947. These estimates are based on the assumption that this legislation would not affect the projected rate of entrances into training which has been used as the basis of Veterans' Administration budget estimates. It is anticipated, however, by the Veterans' Administration, that the rate of entrance into training would be greatly accelerated upon enactment of this bill because of the material relaxation of the ceiling provisions now in effect.

Your request is for estimated cost alone. However, reference is made to my comments on the merits of this type of legislation, and the effects thereof, which were furnished in my report to your committee dated February 18, 1947, and in my statement before your committee in hearings conducted February 18 and 19, 1947.

Sincerely yours,

OMAR N. BRADLEY,
General, United States Army, Administrator.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am not going to object, and I do not think anyone on this side will object, but I do want to call the attention of the majority to the danger of beginning to pass legislation that will cost millions and perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars, with this sort of consideration. If you want to do it, you may, of course.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I may say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] that I have expressed it as my opinion that this measure is of such importance it should not be considered on the Consent Calendar. I had hoped that the matter would not be on the Consent Calendar. However, it is here. I have taken this time only to explain my attitude in respect to it.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE]?

There was no objection.

PAYMENT AND SETTLEMENT OF MILEAGE AND OTHER ALLOWANCE ACCOUNTS OF MILITARY PERSONNEL

The Clerk called the bill (S. 276) to provide for payment and settlement of mileage and other travel allowance accounts of military personnel.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That payment and settlement of mileage and other travel allowance accounts of all military personnel, when such accounts are authorized to be based on distances between given points, shall be made in accordance with distances established for payment and settlement of mileage accounts of officers pursuant to the provisions of the act of June 12, 1906, as amended (34 Stat. 246; 10 U. S. C. 870).

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING CERTAIN SUBSECTIONS OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1917 AND THE NATIONALITY ACT OF 1940

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 1975) to amend subsection (c) of section 19 of the Immigration Act of 1917 and subsection (a) of section 338 of the Nationality Act of 1940.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. GOSSETT] to explain the provisions of this legislation.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, this bill was recommended by the Justice Department and unanimously reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

It simply does this: Under existing law, a person whose deportation has been ordered can make an affidavit that it would work an economic hardship on an American citizen, and his deportation is suspended. That action is reported to Congress. When Congress adjourns it becomes final, the individual can become a naturalized citizen, and his status in this country is permanent.

This bill gives the Department 5 years' extension of time in which they can suspend the suspension of deportation if they discover that the individual has procured his citizenship or has procured his suspension of deportation through fraud or failure to disclose all pertinent facts. In other words, in effect, it puts such a person on 5 years' probation if he is naturalized or his deportation is suspended, as the case may be. Under existing law the Department of Justice has no such right and a person may through fraud secure permission to remain in this country and become naturalized; and there is no remedy unless you catch it at the time he has his status adjusted.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is rather generally known that there has been an immigration racket going on for some time. The American people are tired of it. It seems to me that we ought to put a stop to immigration for at least 5 years, or at least until we get out of the present crisis. This is merely a halfway measure, to my mind.

Mr. GOSSETT. No, no; this seeks to chink only one of the holes through which certain individuals have become naturalized and have been permitted to remain in this country. This strengthens the law, this does not weaken it.

Mr. RANKIN. Of course, I am for chinking one of the holes as the gentleman says, but I rather think that instead of throwing the gates wide open we ought to do the reverse, close the gates until we get back to Americanism.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman a question. He has explained that this suspends deportation and reinstates deportable status, but what about the cancellation of citizenship after the person has been naturalized?

Mr. GOSSETT. The last section of the bill provides for cancellation of citizenship if it has been obtained through fraud, or failure to disclose material evidence.

Mr. McCORMACK. But it means the Attorney General or the Department of Justice must proceed in court.

Mr. GOSSETT. That is right.

Mr. McCORMACK. In other words, the matter of naturalization is a matter of court action in the final stage authorizing the naturalization of a person, and under this bill whatever action is taken to cancel citizenship where fraud is involved or claimed would have to be taken in the courts.

Mr. GOSSETT. I assume that is true. They would have to go into the court where the person secured his naturalization, because that court would have jurisdiction of the case.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Why not write that into the law?

Mr. GOSSETT. The law is plain enough on that.

Mr. RANKIN. When you leave it to the Department of Justice you will find that you will wait a long time before getting any enforcement of the law, judging from what has happened in the last few years, what has happened in the last few months, and what is happening today. So it seems to me that if Congress is going to legislate we ought to pass laws here providing that any man who secures his citizenship by fraud will have his citizenship canceled and he be deported, and not have to wait for a long drawn-out litigation with the Anti-Defamation League sticking its nose in and muddying the waters.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (c) of section 19 of the Immigration Act of 1917, as amended (54 Stat. 671, 56 Stat. 1044; 8 U. S. C. 155 (c)), is further amended by adding at the end of that subsection the following:

"If at any time within 5 years following termination of the session of the Congress during which cancellation of deportation proceedings was authorized as provided in this subsection it appears to the satisfaction of the Attorney General, upon the basis of newly discovered evidence, that the alien was not in fact eligible under this subsection for suspension of deportation, the Attorney General shall cancel the order suspending deportation (and the record of the alien's admission for permanent residence, if such record was made) and may thereafter proceed against the alien as if suspension of deportation had not previously been ordered. The Secretary of State shall remove the charge, if any, previously made against the quota for the country of the alien's nationality, but no refund of the fee of $18 prescribed herein may be made."

SEC. 2. That subsection (a) of section 338 of the Nationality Act of 1940 (54 Stat. 1158; 8 U. S. C. 738 (a)), is hereby amended by inserting the following language before the period at the end thereof: "or on the ground that the order of the Attorney General suspending deportation pursuant to the provisions of section 19 (c) of the Immigration Act of 1917, as amended (56 Stat. 1044; 8 U. S. C. 155 (c)), has been canceled."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the word "newly" and insert the word "after."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CORPS OF CIVIL ENGINEERS OF THE NAVY

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 1359) to amend the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 556), as amended, so as to increase the total authorized number of commissioned officers of the active list of the Corps of Civil Engineers of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the author of the bill just what extra cost, if any, is involved. I think I am for the bill if I understand it.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, since I am chairman of Subcommittee No. 1 on Personnel of the Armed Services Committee and held the hearings on this particular measure, may I say to the gentleman that this increases the number of civil engineers in the Navy from 2 to 3 percent of the active officers in line of duty. In 1939 our Naval Establishment value was less than $1,000,000,000. During the war it expanded greatly and today we have more than $6,000,000,000 invested in these shore facilities that are very complex and the number of civil engineers is wholly inadequate to man and to maintain these complex establishments.

The Navy made a very strong case for this particular bill. It was reported unanimously by our subcommittee and also by the full committee. It perhaps will involve an increase of about 660 officers. Of course, the civil engineers did a marvelous job during the war. Three hundred officers are required to take care of the Seabees alone. At Corpus Christi, Tex., we have only two or three officers to take care of an establishment which is worth more than $62,000,000. At another place we have over $88,000,000 invested in a plant and we have only three civil-engineer officers there. At Crane, Ind., which is very quiet, no construction being involved, we have a big maintenance problem, yet we have only two civil-engineer officers there.

It is necessary that this legislation be passed in order that the Navy might have a sufficient number of men to look after these huge establishments in which we have more than $6,000,000,000 invested.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the items listed we are handicapped on account of lack of report. I would like to insist that all of the committees file reports. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri if he knows what the estimated cost will be?

Mr. SHORT. I asked that question myself during the hearings. It will depend altogether on the authorized strength of the Navy. At the present time it is 500,000 enlisted men and about 52,000 officers. The pending bill will increase the number of civil-engineer officers by about 660, according to Admiral Jelley who testified before our committee. I may say to the gentleman that there is a report on the bill and also copy of the hearings, both of which I hold in my hand.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I see here a report from the Navy Department and one from the War Department but I do not see one from the Budget Bureau or any estimate as to the extra cost involved by this bill.

Mr. SHORT. It is impossible for them to give a definite amount. I asked the admiral how many men would be added and his answer was that it would depend upon the authorized strength of the line. I, myself, am concerned about the additional cost, but we were assured that it would be very little, if any. These officers are shifted from one category to another. We must have more civil engineers to supervise and protect these increased and complex shore facilities.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That that part of the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 576), which relates to the commissioned officer strength of the active list of the Corps of Civil Engineers and which is amended by the act of July 22, 1935 (49 Stat. 488), as so amended, is hereby further amended by striking out the figure "2" as it appears after the words "Civil Engineers" in line 2, paragraph 5, page 489, of volume 49, Statutes at Large, and inserting in lieu thereof the figure "3."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, strike out all of line 4 after the comma, all of lines 5 and 6 and the words "as so amended" in line 7 and insert: "such act having been amended by the act of July 22, 1935 (49 Stat. 488), which relates to the commissioned officer strength of the active list of the Corps of Civil Engineers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be permitted to sit tomorrow and perhaps another day during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

PERMANENT CHIEF OF CHAPLAINS IN THE NAVY

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 1365) to establish a Chief of Chaplains in the United States Navy, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be in the Bureau of Naval Personnel a Chief of Chaplains, designated by the Chief of Naval Personnel from among officers of the Chaplain Corps of the Regular Navy not below the rank of commander; and that such officer shall, while so serving, have the rank of rear admiral and shall receive the pay and allowances provided by law for rear admirals of the upper half.

SEC. 2. The act of December 22, 1944 (ch. 661, 58 Stat. 886), is hereby repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MINERAL LEASING ACT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 193) to amend section 35 of the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437; 30 U. S. C., sec. 191), as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I inquire of the Delegate from Alaska if this bill in any way affects the naval petroleum reserves in Alaska?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I assure the gentleman from New York that the enactment of this bill will not affect in any manner the present administration of income from the naval petroleum reserves. That matter is governed by a separate law first enacted in 1920 and amended in 1938. All this would do would be to clear the record and allow the present system to be continued.

Mr. COLE of New York. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 35 of the act entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain," approved February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437; 30 U. S. C., sec. 191), as amended, is amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"SEC. 35. All money received from sales, bonuses, royalties, and rentals of public lands under the provisions of this act shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States; 37½ percent thereof shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State or the Territory of Alaska within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits are or were located; said moneys to be used by such State, Territory, or subdivisions thereof for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions, as the legislature of the State or Territory may direct; and, excepting those from Alaska, 52½ percent thereof shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated, as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress known as the Reclamation Act, approved June 17, 1902. All moneys received under the provisions of this act not otherwise disposed of by this section shall be credited to miscellaneous receipts. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the disposition of proceeds or income derived by the United States from mineral school sections in the Territory of Alaska as provided for in the act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat. 1214, 1215; 48 U. S. C., sec. 353), as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PETERSBURG (ALASKA) TOWN SITE

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 197) to transfer part of block 90 and the school building thereon of Petersburg town site, Alaska, used for school purposes, to the town of Petersburg, Alaska.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object because there is a very small amount involved here, but I would like to make a statement to the committee reporting the bill in connection with reports to be attached to bills. I shall object from here, because this bill is not properly reported, and we cannot study them unless reports are included here.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, in order that there may be no misunderstanding or confusion caused by the suggestion made by the gentleman, I wonder wherein he might indicate that the report which accompanies the bill was defective. I think it is fine for the gentleman to point out defects as they occur and to urge the committee staffs and clerks to make certain that the reports are complete, but as I view this particular report it appears to be complete, unless I have overlooked some particular point.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I am talking about all of the reports; from the Budget and everybody else.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, on behalf of the committee, may I state to the gentleman that the bill was carefully considered by a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands, and again by the full Committee on Public Lands, and unanimously approved by both, also by the Department of the Interior. It is accompanied by a report, Report No. 98.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That there is hereby conveyed to the town of Petersburg, Alaska, that part of block 90 within Petersburg town site, Alaska, as shown on United States Survey No. 1252, as may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, together with the school building located thereon for use by the town for school purposes. The grant herein shall become effective upon notice by the Secretary of the Interior to the town of Petersburg of the detailed description of the land and the written acceptance of the grant by the proper officials of the town of Petersburg.

With the following committee amendments:

In the first line in the title of the bill amend by striking out the figure "90" and inserting in lieu thereof the figure "14."

Line 4 after the first comma, strike the words "that part" and insert in lieu thereof "lots 9 and 10", and that the figure "90" after the word "block" be stricken and the figure "14" be inserted therefor.

Line 5 after the first comma strike out "as shown on United States Survey No. 1252."

Line 6 strike out the entire line, including the comma at the end of the line.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to transfer part of block 14 and the school building thereon of Petersburg town site, Alaska, used for school purposes, to the town of Petersburg, Alaska."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER FOR THE BIG BEND NATIONAL PARK, TEX.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 490) providing for the appointment of a United States Commissioner for the Big Bend National Park in the States of Texas, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the establishment of the Big Bend National Park in the State of Texas pursuant to the provisions of the act of June 20, 1935 (49 Stat. 393), entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of the Big Bend National Park in the State of Texas, and for other purposes," the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas shall, upon the recommendation and approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a qualified candidate, appoint a commissioner for the said national park. The district court shall prescribe the rules of procedure and practice for the commissioner in the trial of cases and for appeal to the district court. The commissioner shall be paid an annual salary, as appropriated for by the Congress.

SEC. 2. The commissioner shall have jurisdiction to issue process in the name of the United States for the arrest of any person charged with a violation of any of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior in pursuance of law for the government and protection of the park, or with the commission within the park of a petty offense against the law, and to try the person so charged, who, if found guilty, shall be subject to the punishment prescribed by section 3 of the act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535; U. S. C., title 16, sec. 3), as amended. For the purposes of this act, the term "petty offense" shall be defined as in section 335 of the Criminal Code (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 541). In all cases of conviction an appeal shall lie from the judgment of said commissioner to the district court.

SEC. 3. The commissioner shall have power to issue process in the name of the United States for the arrest of any person charged with the commission within said park of any criminal offense not covered by the provisions of section 2 of this act, and to hear the evidence introduced. If he is of the opinion that probable cause is shown for holding the person so charged for trial, he shall commit such person for further appropriate action, and shall certify a transcript of the record of his proceedings and the testimony in such case to the district court, which court shall have jurisdiction of the case.

SEC. 4. All fees, costs, and expenses arising in cases under this act and properly chargeable to the United States shall be certified, approved, and paid as are like fees, costs, and expenses in the courts of the United States. All fines, fees, costs, and expenses imposed and collected shall be deposited by the commissioner, or by the marshal of the United States collecting the same, with the clerk of the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas.

With the following committee amendment:

Committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, after the comma, strike out the balance of line down to and including the comma on line 10.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER FOR THE SHENANDOAH NATIONAL PARK

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 729) to provide that the United States District Court for the Western District of Virginia shall alone appoint the United States commissioner for the Shenandoah National Park.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I inquire of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] if there is any criticism directed to the Department of the Interior or the method in which the present commissioner has been named.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. BARRETT. May I say to my colleague that the Department of the Interior did raise some little objection to this bill. However, at the time the law was passed providing that the Secretary of the Interior should approve and recommend to various district courts the names of persons for appointment as United States Commissioners in National Parks the Interior Department was paying the salaries of these Commissioners, but presently and for several years past these Commissioners are being paid entirely out of funds appropriated to the Department of Justice. Of course, the reason for the consent and approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the appointment of National Park Commissioners has long since expired.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the first sentence of section 5 of the act entitled "An Act to direct the Secretary of the Interior to notify the State of Virginia that the United States assumes police jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Shenandoah National Park, and for other purposes," approved August 19, 1937 (U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 16, sec. 403c-5), is amended by striking out "upon the recommendation and approval of the Secretary of the Interior of a qualified candidate."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FARMERS' IRRIGATION DISTRICT, NORTH PLATTE PROJECT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 804) authorizing the reduction of certain accrued interest charges payable by the farmers' irrigation district, North Platte project.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized in administering the North Platte project, Nebraska-Wyoming, to enter into a contract of July 15, 1947, heretofore entered into pursuant to the act of February 21, 1911 (36 Stat. 925), between the United States and the Farmers' Irrigation District, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Nebraska, whereby the said district shall be relieved and excused of the obligation to pay $59,853, representing part of the accrued interest due the United States from the district pursuant to the terms of article 2 (c) of said contract of July 15, 1927: Provided, That the district agrees, on terms satisfactory to the Secretary, to operate and maintain the several drain diversion works now or hereafter to be constructed emptying waste, seepage, and return flow waters into the district's canal.

With the following committee amendments:

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATURALIZATION PROCEEDINGS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 236) to amend the Nationality Act of 1940 so as to permit naturalization proceedings to be had at places other than in the office of the clerk or in open court in the case of sick or physically disabled individuals.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 331 of the Nationality Act of 1940, as amended (54 Stat. 1153; U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 8, sec. 731), as precedes paragraph (1) thereof, (excluding the heading) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 331. An applicant for naturalization shall make, under oath before, and unless prevented by sickness or other physical disability only in the office of, the clerk of court or such clerk's authorized deputy, regardless of the place of residence in the United States of the applicant, not less than 2 nor more than 7 years at least prior to the applicant's petition for naturalization, and after the applicant has reached the age of 18 years, a signed declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States, which declaration shall be set forth in writing, in triplicate, and shall contain substantially the following averments by such applicant:"

SEC. 2. Section 332 of the Nationality Act of 1940, as amended (54 Stat. 1154; U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 8, sec. 732), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) If the applicant for naturalization is prevented by sickness or other disability from presenting himself in the office of the clerk to make the petition required by subsection (a), such applicant may make such petition at such other place as may be designated by the clerk of court or by such clerk's authorized deputy."

SEC. 3. (a) Section 334 (a) of the Nationality Act of 1940, as amended (54 Stat. 1156; U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 8, sec. 734 (a), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 334. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, every final hearing upon a petition for naturalization shall be had in open court before a judge thereof, and every final order which may be made upon such petition shall be under the hand of the court and entered in full upon a record kept for that purpose, and upon such final hearing of such petition the applicant and the witnesses shall be examined under oath before the court and in the presence of the court."

(b) Section 334 (b) of such act, as amended (54 Stat. 1156; U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 8, sec. 734 (b)), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "If the petitioner is prevented by sickness or other disability from being in open court for the final hearing upon a petition for naturalization, such final hearing may be had before a judge or judges of the court at such place as may be designated by the court."

SEC. 4. Section 335 of such act, as amended (54 Stat. 1157; U. S. C., title 8, sec. 735), is hereby amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(d) If the petitioner is prevented by sickness or other disability from being in open court the oath prescribed in subsection (a) of this section may be taken before a judge of the court at such place as may be designated by the court."

SEC. 5. Before a declaration of intention or petition for naturalization may be made outside of the office of the clerk of court, or before a final hearing on a petition may be held or the oath of allegiance administered outside of open court, the court must satisfy itself that the illness or other disability is sufficiently serious to prevent appearance in the office of the clerk of court or the court and is of a permanent nature, or of a nature which so incapacitates the person as to prevent him from personally appearing in the office of the clerk of court or in court as otherwise required by law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTINUITY OF RESIDENCE OF CERTAIN ALIEN RESIDENTS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2032) to preserve the continuity of residence in the United States for naturalization purposes in the cases of alien residents who departed for service in Allied armed forces during the Second World War.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

RECEIVING OF STOLEN PUBLIC PROPERTY

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 1998) to amend section 48 of the Criminal Code relating to the receiving of stolen public property.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 48 of the Criminal Code (35 Stat. 1098; 18 U. S. C. 101) be, and it hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 48. Whoever shall receive, conceal, or aid in concealing, or shall have or retain in his possession, with intent to convert to his own use or gain, any money, property, record, voucher, or valuable thing whatever, of the moneys, goods, chattels, records, or property of the United States, which has theretofore been embezzled, stolen, or purloined by any other person, knowing the same to have been embezzled, stolen, or purloined, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both; and such person may be tried either before or after the conviction of the principal offender."

AMENDMENT OF LOCOMOTIVE INSPECTION ACT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2123) to amend the Locomotive Inspection Act of February 17, 1911, as amended.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the third and fourth sentences of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911, as amended (U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 45, secs. 24 and 25), are amended to read as follows: "The Interstate Commerce Commission shall have authority, in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to fix the compensation of the director of locomotive inspection, the assistant directors, and the district inspectors; and each of such persons shall be paid his traveling expenses incurred in performance of his duties. The office of the director of locomotive inspection shall be in Washington, District of Columbia, and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall provide such legal, technical, stenographic, and clerical help as the business of the offices of the director of locomotive inspection, his said assistants, and the district inspectors may require."

SEC. 2. Section 4 of such act approved February 17, 1911, as amended (U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 45, sec. 26), is further amended by striking out the fifth and sixth sentences thereof.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act shall have the effect of abolishing the position or reducing the present salary of an incumbent of any existing position established under such act approved February 17, 1911, as amended.

SEC. 4. This act shall take effect on the first day of the calendar month following the calendar month in which it is enacted.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of the Consent Calendar, the other bills on the Calendar not having been there long enough to be eligible for consideration today.

MAINTAINING SYNTHETIC RUBBER INDUSTRY

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Resolution 144 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) to strengthen the common defense by maintaining an adequate domestic rubber-producing industry. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committtee on Armed Services, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes of the time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], and yield myself now such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 144 would make in order the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 118, to strengthen the common defense by maintaining an adequate domestic rubber-producing industry. As I see it, this joint resolution has three general purposes:

First. To allow the Government to continue to acquire rubber in its own account for stock piling in the event of an emergency. This power, provided in the Second War Powers Act of 1942, as amended, expires the last day of this month. This joint resolution would extend that power temporarily until permanent legislation is enacted, but, in any event, this measure would cease to be operative after March 31, 1948.

Second. This resolution would prevent the disintegration of our synthetic-rubber-producing industry. Synthetic rubber cannot compete with natural crude rubber in an absolutely free market. Therefore, when natural crude rubber becomes plentiful within the next year it would entirely replace synthetic rubber, and our synthetic-rubber industry would collapse. The United States spent more than three-quarters of a billion dollars to develop the necessary factories, and they should be maintained in the event of a national emergency. House Joint Resolution 118 would permit the continuation of allocation, specification, and inventory controls on crude rubber. This will guarantee the use of some synthetic rubber and insure the preservation of that industry.

Third. This joint resolution would permit domestic users of crude rubber to buy in the foreign markets, and thereby protect the interests of our small businessmen. At present all purchases of crude rubber are made by the Government. Under the present system of Government allocation, the small manufacturers of rubber goods have not received their fair share of certain grades of rubber. By permitting users to buy directly in foreign markets, this measure would insure the small businessmen an equitable share of the total available supply of crude rubber.

This joint resolution has the endorsement of the Secretaries of War and the Navy, and was reported with but two dissenting votes by the Committee on Armed Services.

This resolution, which makes in order consideration of House Joint Resolution 118, was reported unanimously by the Committee on Rules. Although the joint resolution cannot be thought of as controversial or partisan in nature, it is rather technical and deserves detailed explanation. Therefore, the rule provides for 2 hours of general debate. This is a general rule, permitting amendments under the 5-minute rule and one motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a little difference of opinion within the Committee on Armed Services. However, that committee is in favor of doing something about the synthetic-rubber problem and the importation of crude rubber.

There were some differences of opinion as to how long the Government should continue to purchase natural rubber and when purchases might be made in a free market. There was no difference of opinion in the committee as to the continuation, for the present at least, of the allocations by the Government of the crude rubber which comes into this country. I am sure that we all realize that the question of when Government buying should end must be considered carefully. I hope there will be no opposition to the rule and that we may pass upon this grave problem promptly, with the best interests of the Nation first in mind.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

RULE ON SYNTHETIC RUBBER AND STOCK-PILING BILL EXPLAINED

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] has explained the rule, and to some extent he has also explained the bill. However, I know that later on the chairman of the committee and the ranking members will even more fully explain the need for this legislation.

Of course, I cannot quite understand why it is necessary to give control to the Government so often called bureaucratic when the Government does not ask or desire such control. I have heard a great deal of criticism from you against the Government for insisting on retaining controls which you objected to strenuously. Today, notwithstanding the fact that neither the Administration nor any of the departments is seeking the power of control or distribution of this rubber, it is insisted that such power be given to the Government, willy nilly.

WHERE IS RUBBER FROM GUAYULE PLANTS?

There are some of you who will recall that in the Seventy-eight and Seventy-ninth Congresses we expended large sums of money in the hope that we could grow in th United States, plants that would produce the needed rubber. We even purchased—and I opposed it then—a certain corporation which had been experimenting in Mexico and some other places in growing guayule plants. I have not see any report yet as to the extent we succeeded, and how wisely we acted and expended those hundreds of thousands of dollars.

I agree with the gentleman from Ohio that we have spent three-quarters of a billion in building plants to manufacture synthetic rubber. Some of the plants are owned by the Government. I do not think we should do anything that would in any way endanger the terrific expenditure made on those plants or that they should be discarded or abandoned, as I fear they might be. I am told that some of those plants can with further experience produce synthetic rubber for not much more than we can buy the natural rubber. Synthetic rubber is indeed more suitable for many of the things for which rubber is required.

MANY SUFFER FROM HYSTERIA

Nevertheless, in deference to the view that we must safeguard ourselves against future contingencies, I have no objection either to the rule or to the bill.

However, I feel that many of the gentlemen, in and out of Congress, who so ardently advocate this bill, are suffering from hysteria.

They believe that we must be involved again in war. They are frightened.

I hope to God no such thing ever happens.

We have not yet brought home from foreign battlefields those who fell for their country and their fellowmen in this last terrible war.

Should we not hesitate before we take any action that may in the slightest degree tend to plunge us into a third world war?

Some people, of course, thrive on war talk. I am not one of them.

I hope, therefore, that notwithstanding the passage of this resolution and bill it does not mean we are preparing for war.

I am satisfied that the American people are against war and all wise, prudent, honest, fair men are opposed to any action that we might take which will involve us in war. Therefore, let us work toward bringing about harmony and understanding so that we can be spared again the unnecessary misery that the recent war has brought us.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE INTENDED TO INSURE PEACE

Mr. Speaker, I have studied carefully President Truman's message to Congress on the subject of aid to Greece.

You know that I am a progressive Democrat, and I have confidence in President Truman. I know that he is a sincere, patriotic, forward-looking American, and I cannot believe that his message was intended to involve us in war but was to facilitate the adjusting of any and all differences existing, or which might exist, between our country and Soviet Russia.

I cannot and will not believe otherwise. I know it is the President's aim and intent not to weaken but to strengthen the United Nations, and his recommendations for direct American intervention in Greece were made only because the United Nations is not yet mature enough and strong enough to function as the whole world feels it should.

SHOULD AID STARVING PEOPLE EVERYWHERE

Personally, I feel that we should extend all possible aid, without any strings attached except that our relief shall not be used to starve the opposition into submission as the British used UNNRA supplies in Greece, to all the tragic and starving people of the world, who are suffering now in the war's aftermath as much as they did during the war itself.

BUT FEED THEM BREAD, NOT BULLETS

But I know it is the intention of the President to feed these people bread, not bullets.

I shall resist with all my strength, and I know the American people will resist, any effort to make the President's words mean anything else.

On the other hand, I believe that he has intended to expedite and facilitate other negotiations in the Near East—there are many small feudal kingdoms there who need, or believe they need, our help; or is it possible the oil interests have somehow imposed upon us?

ADVISERS MAY HAVE IMPOSED ON PRESIDENT

Mr. Speaker, withal this, I fear that President Truman, whom I know to be a great and honorable American, a wonderful humanitarian who hates war and seeks only relief of starving people, not only in Greece but the world over, may have been imposed upon by that Wall Street lawyer, John Foster Dulles, and perhaps by the Under Secretary of State, the Honorable Dean Acheson, too thoroughly indoctrinated by shrewd British diplomats determined that we shall shoulder their burdens of empire and take over their defaulted commitments.

They undoubtedly hastened the President's action by pressing for such a declaration without waiting for the report of our own American Economic Mission to Greece, or the report of the United Nations Commission of Investigation, both of which are still in that country carrying out their inquiries, and without reference to the rehabilitation program devised by the Food and Agriculture Organization many months ago.

HOPE OF AMERICAN PEOPLE AND OF WORLD LIES IN UN

I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the United States and of the whole world are of the firm opinion that the United Nations was established for the purpose of adjusting any and all discords of disagreements among the nations in order to bring peace to this troubled earth, and that the hopes of the common people lie in UN.

Only this morning I read that General MacArthur proposed and urged that American troops be withdrawn from Japan as soon as possible, and that United Nations then take over the profoundly important job of supervising and encouraging the growth of democracy there.

LaGuardia, too, is a strong advocate of the United Nations' taking over these tasks, and through his experience as Director General of United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration he is thoroughly conversant with the problems and the possibilities.

PRESIDENT AIMED TO STRENGTHEN HANDS OF MARSHALL

It is my firm belief, and any other belief is unthinkable, that the President did not intend to by-pass the United Nations but only to insure the earliest possible peace for Greece and to strengthen the hands of our great Secretary of State, General Marshall, because it would have a wholesome effect in bringing all countries to realize and understand that we stand strongly for those things for which we fought—to bring about real freedom, real democracy, and real independence to all the peoples of the world.

I am sure that the President will not and cannot be swayed by those who have no faith in the people, who are unfriendly to the democratic way of life, and that his individual conviction and great heart will dictate a determined policy of feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and aiding suffering people, and that he will courageously resist any effort to use American strength and power to aid any tyrannical or corrupt regimes to hold the masses in subjugation against their will.

It would be equally incredible to believe that any aid we might extend to Turkey, which has never shown undue friendship for democracy as we know it, would be knowingly used to help keep the present absolute government in power there against the desire of the Turkish people.

I hope that within a short space of time we will receive a favorable report; that we will be proud and pleased that conditions are improved; and that any danger of war is eliminated.

I trust that the Almighty will give us light and wisdom enough to prevent the bloodshed incident to any war and to ward off further misery to our country.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACKINNON].

Mr. MACKINNON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in two instances and to include an article and a statement by the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in this legislation dealing with the Nation's rubber supply. During the past several years I have given considerable attention to this matter and I hope that the bill we have before us today will lead to a sound, permanent rubber policy.

The necessity for this country having an adequate supply of rubber is not a debatable matter. We could not have won the last war had it not been for our synthetic rubber program. Those of you who served in previous Congresses will recall that the Congress passed a rubber bill centralizing the program and directing the manufacture of synthetic rubber in this country. That bill was vetoed by President Roosevelt, but by Executive order the principle was adopted and a rubber czar was appointed. Mr. Jeffers made that program a successful one.

Now, we have those synthetic rubber plants. They are already in existence. Unless this Congress takes action soon, those plants will go into the discard or be converted into something else. Certainly it is in the interest of the peace of the world to have this country self-sufficient in rubber. The action that we are taking today fits in, I believe, with a bill that I will file within the next day or two. The purpose of that legislation will be to give a tax advantage to the manufacturer of synthetic rubber when it is made of alcohol from agricultural products.

At the present time all of these plants are owned by the Government. Unless a long-range program can be worked out that will assure a market for American made synthetic rubber those plants will go into the discard. We should make it desirable for American businessmen to buy those plants and operate them.

It is in the interest of the defense of the country and in the interest of perpetuating our synthetic rubber industry that this legislation will be offered.

Now, the reason that I will single out alcohol made from farm products as the recipient of this tax advantage is that it will fit in with a general agricultural program. In this country we are plagued with surpluses; some of them may be seasonal, but sometimes, in the nonperishable commodities, we are confronted with millions of bushels of grain and other products that depress the market. The Treasury of the United States is called upon to spend millions of dollars to relieve that situation and to support prices. Why should we not turn those surplus farm products into rubber that we need so badly? The purpose of the legislation which will be offered soon will aim to do that very thing. We are startled sometimes about the reports that we see in the papers. For instance, thousands of bushels of potatoes are dumped because there is no market for them. That should not be, because those potatoes can be turned into alcohol and, in turn, made into rubber, and serve this country. The alcohol can be stored indefinitely. It can be made to work into a long-range program, fitting both the needs of national defense and our domestic economy, and be made to conform with the farm program of the Nation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to ask the author of the resolution now before us if this legislation before us today, which extends allocation control over rubber, would interfere with a rubber program along the lines that I have suggested.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In reply to the gentleman, this bill today calls for the establishment of and the setting up of machinery looking forward to permanent legislation to deal with the whole synthetic industry, and in view of the fact that agricultural products come within the family of fermenting products, the fermentation industry, anything that ferments can be converted into alcohol, and alcohol can be converted into synthetic rubber, so the whole scheme moves together in one general direction, and perhaps there is a tremendous answer to agriculture if we can bring ourselves to where agricultural products can be used in the fermentation process, and to a point where subsidies would be no longer required.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the gentleman one other question? Does the gentleman think there is any chance of getting the American businessmen to buy these plants now owned by the Government and embark upon a program of operating them and making rubber unless a Government policy is adopted that assures them of their position in our market for a reasonable length of time, at least?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is in the permanent legislation to which this bill refers that the answer will be found to that question.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, men and women the world over today continue to perpetuate the sanctity and miraculous deeds of St. Patrick, patron saint of Ireland.

St. Patrick is one of the great figures of church and of history.

No man since the death of the Redeemer so fired the spiritual imagination of a people, so vitally influenced the heart and mind of a nation. The people of Ireland have ever practiced the lessons learned in the early days of history when the light of Christianity, through the religious revelations of St. Patrick first broke through the darkness of paganism. The inspirational teachings and miraculous life of this great apostle have left an indelible imprint on the national life of Eire, and on countless millions of people elsewhere.

Ireland, its people, their descendants, as well as millions of other peoples have never wavered in their adherence to and practice of all the spiritual values bequeathed by St. Patrick.

The date of his birth has variously been placed at from A. D. 373 to 389. At the age of 16 he was captured by Irish marauders and sold as a slave to a chieftain in a territory of the present county of Antrim in Ireland, where for 6 years he tended flocks. During the years of his captivity, he prepared himself for his future apostolate, acquiring a perfect knowledge of the Celtic tongue and, as his master was a druidical high priest, becoming familiar with all the details of druidism, from whose bondage he liberated the Irish race. He escaped from Antrim and went back to his own country. Impelled by visions, similar to those which inspired Joan of Arc, he decided to return to Ireland and preach the gospel. He went to France, was educated, ordained a priest, and later consecrated bishop.

Subsequently, accompanied by several ecclesiastics, he was sent to Ireland.

St. Patrick wrote two short works, both of which have survived: his Confessio and his Epistle to Coroticus. In his Confessio the character of St. Patrick is completely revealed, exemplifying, as it does, his piety, zeal, sacrifice, and courage in the face of every danger and every trial.

It was probably in the summer months of the year 433 that Patrick and his companions landed on the banks of the Vantry River, close to Wicklow Head. The Druids were at once in arms against him. St. Patrick, not discouraged, resolved to search a more friendly territory. He proceeded toward Dalaradia, where he had been a slave, to pay the price of his ransom to his former master. He then rested for some days at the islands off the Skerries coast. Tradition points out the impression of St. Patrick's foot upon the hard rock off the main shore at the entrance to Skerries Harbor. He continued his course northward and preached to the natives in their native tongue the tidings of the Redemption. There he performed his first miracle on Irish soil to confirm the honor due the Blessed Virgin and the divine birth of Christ. Proceeding onward he was met by a chieftain who sought to prevent his further advance. The chieftain drew his sword, but his arm became rigid as a statue and continued so, according to tradition, until he declared himself obedient to Patrick. Overcome by the Saint's meekness and miracles, the chieftain asked instructions and made a gift of a large barn in which the Sacred Mysteries were offered. This was the first sanctuary consecrated by St. Patrick in Erin. In later years it became the chosen retreat of the Saint.

In the year 440 St. Patrick entered on a special work of the conversion of Ulster, and the following year the Lives relate the wonderful spread of Christianity through the province. In 444 the site for a church was granted at Armagh by the chieftain of the district.

He continued ever onward throughout Ireland. The fame of his miracles and sanctity preceded him wherever he traveled.

St. Patrick continued to preach the Gospel until his death, visiting and watching over all the churches he had founded. He comforted the people in their difficulties, strengthened them in the practice of virtue and appointed pastors to continue his work among them. It is recorded that he consecrated not less than 350 bishops. The manifold virtues of all the early saints were exemplified in the life of St. Patrick. When not engaged in the work of his ministry, he spent his time in prayer. He never relaxed penitential exercises. Clothed in rough hair shirt he made the hard rock his bed. Countless persons of high rank presented him with rare gifts, but all were restored to them. He had not come to Erin in search of material wealth. His mission was to enrich Ireland with spiritual treasures.

The apostolate of St. Patrick in Ireland was not an unbroken series of triumphs. He was subjected to frequent trials at the hands of the Druids and other enemies of Christianity. He tells in his Confessio that no fewer than 12 times he and his companions were seized and carried off as captives, and on one occasion in particular he was placed in chains and his death decreed. From all these trials and sufferings he was liberated.

St. Patrick, when he had completed his triumph over paganism in Ireland, prepared for his eternal reward. It is recorded that in his last prayer a special vision was shown him. He saw the whole of Ireland lit up with the brightest rays of divine faith. St. Patrick prayed that this light would never be extinguished, and as he prayed an angel came to him and said: "Fear not, your apostolate shall never cease." The light grew in brightness and did not cease until all the hills and valleys of Ireland were lit up in splendor. The angel again spoke: "Such shall be the abiding splendor of divine truth in Ireland."

St. Patrick died at Saul on March 17, 493. Some of the ancient Lives record that for several days the light of heaven shone around his bier.

Today every friend of Ireland in America recalls the glory of St. Patrick. Fifteen centuries have failed to dim, despite vicissitude, war, and famine, the loyalty and devotion of Ireland to the heritage of the great apostle.

Devotion to liberty, steadfastness in the cause of justice, zeal for learning, love of music, charm of wit, fidelity to God, lessons taught by St. Patrick and never forgotten by the followers of this great apostle, have and ever will endear the Irish to the nations of the world.

Unselfish to a fault in a selfish world, the motto "not for ourselves, but others" is ever a guide post for those of Irish ancestry as they follow in the footsteps of St. Patrick—the epitome of unselfishness.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it would indeed be grand if the leaders of all churches should emulate the teachings of the great patron saint of Ireland, St. Patrick, who actually followed the teachings of Christ in his daily life, and by his works proved his faith in humility, brotherhood, justice, freedom, and liberty. I congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts for the wonderful address on the life and works of St. Patrick, whose whole existence was dedicated to and proof of justice and brotherly love.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I received a letter this morning from our genial friend, Joe O'Brien. This is what he writes:

> DEAR BOB: Greetings, salutations, and every good wish from your sincere Irish friend who could not let this glorious day pass without sincerely saying "God bless you, may your life be filled with happiness, health, and prosperity, from a descendant of St. Patrick whose ancestors were the noble kings of Ireland.
> JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLASON].

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of Members of the House some changes which I think should be made in House Joint Resolution 118, in order to make it for the best interests of the American consumers. I believe that as it is now written, this resolution forgets the American consumer. I say that for this reason: At the present time the United States Government is buying all of the crude rubber which comes into the United States. It is allocating it, on the basis of plant capacity, to the different companies. There are about 800, as I understand, in the United States, making about 40,000 different items. During the war companies changed their plant capacities. Therefore, it was decided that in order to be fair to every one of the companies using crude rubber, the allocation should be on the basis of their present-day plant capacity. It is my understanding that this is entirely satisfactory to the industry. It is fair to the large and to the small consumers alike. They all get treated on exactly the same basis.

I think if you will read the testimony of Mr. Schrank of the Seiberling Co. in the hearings, you will see that his company, which is a comparatively small one, buys no rubber in the Far East, and it has to rely on what is brought into this country. Because of the fact that the United States Government is buying all the rubber, this company, as well as all other small companies, is securing its fair allocation of the rubber.

There is a Rubber Advisory Committee to the Government. I believe there are about 17 representatives of the industry on this committee. According to the information which I have received only about two or three of this entire group favored House Joint Resolution 118 as it is now written. Others believe, and believe strongly, that the Government should continue as the sole purchaser of crude natural rubber. It is interesting to note that according to W. J. Sears, who is Director of the Rubber Division of the Civilian Production Administration, and whose testimony is in the hearings, that in his opinion it is better to go ahead with the Government remaining as the sole purchaser of rubber and then allocating the rubber to the different companies which may need it.

Now, what happens under this proposition? The Government finds out from the different consumers about how much rubber they expect to use in the following quarter, or 3 months. Then, having found out that amount, they allocate this rubber. They tell the different companies how much they must pay for it, and the United States Government, before it buys this rubber for these private companies, receives a certified check from each company for the amount it is to have. The Government cannot lose a cent, because the amount that it receives is increased from the price that the Government is paying to the producer, by the amount that the Government expects to pay for the warehousing, interest, and other charges. In fact, as far as the testimony is concerned, the Government has never lost a cent and possibly is ahead.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLASON. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Is it not a fact that if we pass this legislation we will not be dependent hereafter on rubber coming in from foreign countries?

Mr. CLASON. That is not wholly true, because synthetic rubber, according to all the testimony—and, as I understand, all manufacturers agree—is not of as good quality as 100-percent crude rubber. Therefore, for certain products we must have some crude rubber. For practical purposes, that is true.

Mr. RICH. In case of dire emergency our stock pile would be very limited that we would have to carry in order to continue on, in case of a real emergency such as we have just passed through?

Mr. CLASON. We went into the last war with between 500,000 and 600,000 tons of crude rubber in this country. With that total amount, toward the end we got down to the point where we were only able to use 11-percent natural rubber, together with the synthetic rubber. It got to the point where the product was not too good.

Mr. RICH. Is it not a fact today that by using part synthetic rubber and part natural rubber a better product is made than where all natural rubber is used?

Mr. CLASON. No; every manufacturer says that is not so. In other words, our tires today are made of 42 percent natural rubber and 58 percent synthetic. Abroad tires are made of 100 percent natural rubber. They are in position to do that and their tires are better than ours, will give longer wear—and better golf balls, too.

Mr. RICH. That is a point I am interested in.

Mr. CLASON. I thought that would appeal to the gentleman. That is the information I get.

As I was pointing out, the Government cannot lose. The Government stock pile today is 160,000 tons. This stock pile is built up not with Army and Navy funds as a war emergency stock pile, but under RFC funds. The rubber could be distributed to the trade, but is not, and the trade is not asking that it be distributed unless the Government wants to give up holding this stock pile. In fact, the trade would be very glad to get it and pay more than the Government paid for it; so the Government cannot lose.

Mr. Sears, who is the man who runs it, has stated in his testimony that in his opinion the Government cannot lose any money. He has also stated that in his opinion the best way for the Government to handle this program is for the Government to remain the sole purchaser of crude rubber. That is his point.

He also indicates in his testimony that the Government cannot properly control rubber, which individuals may privately buy.

Under the resolution as brought in here—and I hope it will be amended—the Government will no longer be able to allocate rubber as successfully as at present. It is very doubtful if any amendment can be offered to H. R. 118 as now written that will give the Government the right to allocate the rubber successfully other than one containing the present program. The result will be a world market that will cause the price of rubber to jump as it did after the last war. At that time it went to $1.23 a pound. Remember that for every cent rubber goes up the cost of the rubber in your tire goes up ten times. So if the price of rubber goes up 10 cents it means the price of your automobile tire will be increased by a dollar.

I include with these remarks the following table to show the probable course of rubber stocks in the United States:

United States 1947 natural-rubber situation

[Long tons]

	First quarter	Second quarter	Third quarter	Fourth quarter	Year 1947

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] is recognized.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER], chairman of the subcommittee handling the bill under consideration, will be in charge of the time on this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER] is recognized.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 118, to strengthen the common defense by maintaining an adequate domestic rubber-producing industry.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 118, with Mr. PLOESER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] may control the time for the minority.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] will be recognized to control the time on his side.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 12 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, crude or natural rubber is in short supply in the United States today, and undoubtedly will continue to be so until 1948. During the war, the Government found it necessary to control the use of crude rubber drastically, in order to preserve a fast-dwindling rubber reserve. In order to supplement crude rubber, the Government expended millions of dollars on the development of synthetic (or domestic) rubber. It can be safely stated that the development of this industry was a most important factor in the winning of the war.

Now we are faced with the necessity of protecting that domestic industry so vital to the Nation's defense. We are faced with the problem of continuing controls in order to first, assure the maintenance of the synthetic rubber industry; and, second, assure the equal distribution of crude rubber that is still in short supply.

Thus, House Joint Resolution 118 has, basically, a twofold purpose.

We have $786,000,000 invested in synthetic rubber plants. Unless we require, by law, the consumption of some synthetic rubber, that industry will disappear and be lost to the Nation if we are again faced with a national emergency. There can be no question that, at present, natural rubber is more desirable as general-purpose rubber than synthetic. Given an opportunity, through technological development, it is reasonable to anticipate that we may in the near future produce a synthetic rubber that is equal to or better than crude rubber. However, we have not yet reached that point, insofar as general-purpose rubber is concerned.

In order to protect the insufficient natural rubber on hand, the Government required, through specification control, the use of a substantial percentage of synthetic. In addition, through allocation control, the Government, as the sole purchaser of rubber, allocated rubber to rubber manufacturers. Finally, the Government used inventory control to prevent any manufacturer from having on hand more than his share of rubber. These controls coupled with Government purchase of rubber, worked out admirably throughout the war and are still functioning successfully. House Joint Resolution 118 recognizes the necessity for continued controls over rubber.

Two resolutions were considered by the Committee on Armed Services, House Joint Resolution 77 and House Joint Resolution 118. The basic difference between the two resolutions was that House Joint Resolution 77 continued all controls as they are presently operated, and House Joint Resolution 118 eliminates the public purchase feature. After considerable testimony had been taken, the Committee on Armed Services adopted House Joint Resolution 118.

The importance of this legislation to the American people cannot be overestimated. All controls over rubber will expire on the 31st of March of this year. These controls have been operated successfully and have provided the American people with essential rubber products for several years. Should we permit these controls to expire, it requires no imagination to see what the next few months would have in store for the rubber industry. Because of a very understandable human reaction, the first manufacturer to come on the market with an all natural rubber tire, for example, would undoubtedly capture the entire market. Other rubber manufacturers in order to compete, would of necessity, have to scramble on the world market for natural rubber. The net result would be the end of the synthetic rubber industry because without controls no purchases of synthetic rubber of any size would be on the market for that product. In addition, we are faced with the other edge of a double-edge sword, in that we still are in short supply of crude rubber. Elimination of controls would undoubtedly cause unequal distribution of the available crude rubber.

The Committee on Armed Services having considered both resolutions long and carefully, determined that we could eliminate the public purchase of rubber so long as we continued the other necessary controls. We adopted House Joint Resolution 118 because it was felt that there was going to be a sharp increase in the supply of natural rubber in the near future, and that requiring the Government to maintain the necessarily large rubber inventory for the nation, could cause a definite loss to the Government when prices dropped and controls ceased. In addition, it was felt that the restoration of private purchasing was definitely in line with the theory of getting the Government out of business. The Committee recognized that there were features of continued public purchasing that were desirable. On the other hand, it was considered that the reasons for eliminating public purchasing were even more desirable. Therefore, the Committee on Armed Services adopted the resolution that provides for continued controls of rubber, both crude and synthetic but restores private purchasing. We were assured that controls could operate successfully without the Government being the purchaser.

The Committee on Armed Services further felt because of the confusion surrounding the meaning of the word "allocation" that it was desirable to spell out the controls that the Government could continue, and we, therefore, amended the resolution so as to provide specifically for allocation, inventory, and specification control. Also, in order to eliminate any possibility of misunderstanding as to the main purpose of protecting the synthetic-rubber industry, we amended the resolution by adding the words "and synthetic" where reference was made to crude rubber. Finally, your committee recognized that certain types of rubber, such as latex and pale crepes, were in critical short supply, and we are aware of the fact that in order to distribute this rubber properly the Government must, of necessity, allocate these supplies. This can be done, however, through allocation without import control.

In conclusion, I must repeat the urgency of the proposed resolution. Unless some action is taken by Congress before the 31st of March of this year, the synthetic-rubber industry and the rubber industry as a whole may receive a blow that will destroy the synthetic industry and create a confusion in the rubber industry that will ultimately have its effect on increased costs to the consumer.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Representatives of every department of Government came before our committee and testified that public purchasing of rubber should be stopped; every one of them. Only one person in Government—and he was mentioned in the discussion on the rule—came before us and recommended continued purchasing of rubber by the Government. That was one man who has had charge of the Government purchasing. The reason for his wanting to continue the controls is obvious to anyone. Certainly he would like to see his department continue. And it will continue under this resolution. Under this resolution he will still be the man to allocate rubber to these various industries.

If you look through the record of the hearings on this measure, you will find there are hundreds, literally hundreds, of small manufacturers who want the public purchasing discontinued. All are in favor of House Joint Resolution 118. There were three major companies that were for the continued public purchasing, but the overwhelming number of witnesses were for the Crawford bill, which is House Joint Resolution 118.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHAFER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In support of what the distinguished chairman of the committee just said, Members can read pages 899–908 of the hearings and see some 11 pages of telegrams and letters which have been sent in to the chairman of the committee and others in support of this measure. Those are small firms, small manufacturers, who desire that the Government discontinue buying rubber for their account.

Mr. SHAFER. That is true.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to congratulate the gentleman and his committee on bringing this resolution to the floor.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHAFER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. I think it might be interesting to point out in connection with the gentleman's statement as to governmental agencies that those governmental agencies included both the War and Navy Departments and most importantly the War-Navy Munitions Board. There are those who are fearful of military stock piles. The officials of both the War and Navy Departments and the Munitions Board, who are most vitally concerned with this subject, were those who were strongest in the recommendation of the Government's getting out of the purchasing game. It was also the testimony of the State Department and of the former head of the governmental controls, Mr. William L. Batt.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHAFER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman explain to the House why some of these companies favor governmental controls and some do not?

Mr. SHAFER. The answer to your question is all in the record. And there are other reasons which, I am sure, will be brought out later in the debate.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is of primary importance. It is of extreme urgency to the rubber industry of the United States. As the previous speaker has informed you, the temporary controls go off completely at the end of this month. We have in this Nation a brand new American rubber industry which will be entirely out on its own if no action is taken before the first of the month. Therefore, I say the bill is of tremendous importance to the country from the domestic viewpoint and of vital importance from the national defense viewpoint.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I just want to ask one question: Subcommittee 4 of the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I am chairman, is now hearing evidence on the question of controls, and in that is also included this rubber matter. If these controls are entirely eliminated on the 31st of March, what effect will that have on the small dealers throughout the country and the small businessmen throughout the country.

Mr. BROOKS. I am going to touch upon that in just a moment in the course of the remarks I am going to make. I will be glad to answer the question, and if I have not, when I have finished, I would welcome the gentleman's asking me again.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will be very happy to hear the gentleman's explanation of that subject.

Mr. BROOKS. I want to offer a tribute to the subcommittee on the Armed Services Committee that handled the hearings in this matter. From the chairman on down they have done a splendid job. They were painstaking in their efforts to develop all of the facts and were very patient in listening to all the witnesses. After the hearings had been concluded, the subcommittee sent out for four or five experts on rubber and asked them to come down and again present to the committee some of the facts which the committee was doubtful about before the committee finally proceeded to write the bill and to vote on it. So, I think the subcommittee and the chairman are entitled to praise for their interest and patience in developing the hearings on this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I was one of the group in the committee who voted to give some additional time during which the Government might continue its public purchasing program. I voted to extend that time 3 or 4 months and did so solely for the purpose of giving these rubber companies an opportunity to get their business in shape to make the necessary changes.

Mr. Chairman, the hour has come when they must prepare themselves to handle their own businesses. I do not think the situation is such as to justify a long delay in stopping public purchase. In other words, we ought to act and send this bill without amendment to the other body in order that we may take proper action before the first of the month.

Mr. Chairman, this country was in a tragic situation, so far as rubber is concerned, at the time of Pearl Harbor. It is true that the Committee on Military Affairs before that time had made extended investigations of the situations which might develop in the event that we became plunged into war and the importation of rubber from foreign sources was completely cut off. It is true that we have made an effort to build up the stock pile of rubber in the United States so that we would not be placed in the position of being unable to carry on our domestic economy and fight a war for a lack of rubber. We had appropriated money to buy natural rubber. We had built up a stock pile in this country to protect ourselves against any such eventuality. When we were attacked at Pearl Harbor, this Nation had a stock pile of some 500,000 tons of natural rubber and there was at that hour when the future of this country hung in the balance afloat on the high seas 100,000 tons of natural rubber, making a total possible stock pile of 600,000 tons of natural rubber at Pearl Harbor. At that time this amount seemed to us, thinking of prewar days, a sizable stock pile on which a great nation might properly rely in the event of war and in the event our imports of this vital commodity were cut off. Yet, Mr. Chairman, we find as a matter of fact that our consumption of rubber prior to the war in the 5 years immediately preceding Pearl Harbor ran approximately 500,000 to 550,000 tons. So that relying upon our prewar needs at the most this country had only a year's supply on hand. Then when we plunged into war, the demand for rubber increased beyond all expectations. We found in a short while that this Nation needed approximately 1,000,000 tons of rubber per year in order to maintain our domestic economy and carry on a war at the same time. That brought us to a crisis. Those of us who sit here can remember it has been only a few years back when because of scarcity of rubber tires we were limited in the operation of our automobiles to 300 miles per month. It has been only a short time since we were unable to buy rubber commodities generally throughout the country. Those who like to play golf were denied that opportunity because there were no golf balls available. There was very little general rubber available for our needs domestically or for war use. So, in order to meet that situation, immediately our people got busy. As has been well said, we have spent $700,000,000 to $750,000,000 in building up a synthetic rubber industry. That industry is operating and going at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, we can produce a million tons of synthetic rubber in the industry which we built up under the whip of World War II. That industry now is not stable. That is the reason we bring before you House Joint Resolution 118 and ask for its passage. That is the reason why, if controls go off completely on the first of the month, our synthetic-rubber industry will be lost. We cannot afford that. It is very vital to this Nation that we are to have a domestic supply of rubber and we must not permit the synthetic-rubber industry to go out of business. We believe that if House Joint Resolution 118 is passed the synthetic-rubber industry will be protected. We believe it because it will give the Government sufficient controls to protect that industry.

I will illustrate it in this way, Mr. Chairman: At the present time the production of natural rubber in the producing areas of the world is approximately 50 percent of normal production of natural rubber. By the end of 1948 the production of natural rubber in the producing areas of the world ought to reach a normal condition. At that time those areas ought to produce 1,700,000 tons of rubber each year. That amount of rubber is more than the world needs under the present rate of consumption. That amount of rubber will exceed the needs of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] has expired.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes.

So, within a short time we will find in this country that natural rubber is in surplus. In other words, that there is more natural rubber than the country can consume. That puts it directly in competition with our own domestically produced American synthetic rubber.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. Taking into consideration the fact that we will receive a proportionate share of the natural rubber, will that be an amount sufficient for us to produce the rubber that is needed in this country, with the mixture between synthetic and natural rubber as is now contemplated?

Mr. BROOKS. In reply to the gentleman's question, witnesses testified in the hearing that by the end of this year this country should have imported 720,000 tons of natural rubber, as I recall the figure. If that amount of natural rubber is imported into the country, it will give us ample natural rubber to carry on adequately our domestic industries. For instance, we hope to require a minimum of not less than 250,000 tons of synthetic rubber. We hope, by requiring a certain percentage of synthetic rubber to be used in all commodities which require rubber, that we can keep the synthetic industry operating on a minimum basis at home. We can take the economically profitable synthetic-rubber plants, which should produce some 600,000 tons of synthetic rubber each year, and we can keep at least a part of those in operation. For the others we can place them in a stand-by condition against a future emergency when our overseas rubber supply might again be cut off; and by requiring a minimum—not less, let us say, than 15 to 40 percent—of synthetic rubber to be used in the manufacture of rubber commodities, we can guarantee the American rubber industry will continue on an operating basis sufficient to protect the vital needs and interests of the United States of America. This is the reason this bill is so fundamentally important to our people and to the safety of our country.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield.

Mr. ELSTON. I am wondering if Government purchasing is eliminated and we retain our allocation powers, how the Government is going to enforce allocation?

Mr. BROOKS. The Government will enforce them, I may say to the gentleman, through its specification requirements. The Government purchase-of-rubber program is needed only as long as natural rubber is in short supply. In reading the testimony of witnesses before the subcommittee, I am convinced that rubber is just about to come into normal supply in the United States and that within the next few months, if we meet anything like the goals set for us by those in charge of this program, we shall have an ample supply of natural rubber, excepting two particular kinds, that is, pale crepe and liquid latex, to meet our needs and to keep our industry operating as it should operate.

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield.

Mr. MACKINNON. Does this bill require that a minimum percentage of synthetic rubber be used in all rubber products.

Mr. BROOKS. No; may I say to the gentleman, the bill itself provides no percentage but it does give the Government authority to set a percentage in the manufacture of commodities so that a certain percentage of our domestically produced American rubber will be consumed. This percentage requirement may vary with the type of commodity.

The general public seems to have the idea that natural rubber has superior qualities to synthetic rubber. In many respects that is correct; but given ample time, it is more than likely that our chemists will produce a synthetic rubber which in many ways will be far superior to natural rubber. At the present time, it is certain that our synthetic rubber industry must compete with natural rubber, and the trade feels that although natural rubber does have some superior qualifications, the synthetic program must be given protection if we are to continue the production of American synthetic rubber.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLASON].

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Chairman, earlier in the afternoon I attempted to explain to some extent the reason why I believed there should be an amendment to House Joint Resolution 118. The amendment I will offer reads as follows:

On page 3, line 18, after the word "to", insert the words "act as the sole purchaser and seller of crude rubber and to."

Page 2, line 19, strike out the word "temporary."

On page 4, in lines 8 and 9, strike out the words in parenthesis.

On page 5, add a new paragraph as follows:

"(c) The powers, duties, and functions and authority of the United States to act as the sole purchaser and seller of crude rubber to be used in the United States shall continue in force until the effective date of permanent legislation enacted to accomplish the policy set forth in section 1 (b) hereof, but in no event beyond September 30, 1947; and as so continued it is hereby directed that it shall be exercised and performed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation while that Corporation has succession, and thereafter by such officer, agency, or instrumentality of the United States as the President may designate."

The reason why I am offering that amendment is this: All of the testimony indicates that the Government has been successful in its buying of crude rubber abroad. It has carried on the work to the satisfaction of the manufacturers in the United States, it has allocated the rubber that came into the United States, it has not lost a cent of money on the deal and it cannot lose a cent because, as I pointed out before, the manufacturers send in certified checks before the rubber is bought for the entire amount allocated to every purchaser.

England did not permit a free market up until December 31, 1946. During that period of time England saw to it that enough crude rubber went into the pipe lines of the English manufacturers and the English Government so that they are in position to carry on their business for a full year using 100-percent crude rubber. In other words, they have laid in a pile for at least one full year. In fact, they so cut into the amount of available rubber during that period that in order to give to the United States Government the amount that should have been given to it under allocation they furnished out of their own stock piles or whatever rubber was in their control, a certain amount, 70,000 or 75,000 tons, perhaps more, in order to given the United States people the amount that they are entitled to.

The French, on the other hand, have done even better than the British. They have put in enough rubber into their pipe lines and into their supply for France for more than a year and a half, probably close to 2 years.

In the United States we are in such close supply that today we are using 42 percent natural rubber and 58 percent synthetic. Our tires are an inferior product, there is no question about that, so far as rubber is concerned when sold in competition with British tires in any foreign market.

All of us feel that we want to keep this synthetic business of the Government going on such basis that we will never be in actual need of rubber; therefore, the manufacturers say, Let us let the Government continue to buy crude rubber as it has in the past up until September 30.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLASON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SPRINGER. May I say that Subcommittee No. 4 is now hearing testimony on the question of extending the Second War Powers Act, in which is included this rubber situation. If this measure is passed by the House today, will not that legislation take care of the rubber situation without any extension of the Second War Powers Act on the same subject?

Mr. CLASON. I think it would. The only thing that ought to be done by the Congress and ought to be done at once is what the gentleman from Louisiana pointed out. We should pass legislation for the operation of the synthetic rubber plants owned by the United States Government, in other words, either by sale or lease. A certain amount of tonnage should be required to be manufactured and the persons in the United States who use rubber, such as the tire manufacturers, should be required to use that total tonnage which is needed in the interest of the United States.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLASON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SHAFER. Does not Resolution 118 do that?

Mr. CLASON. Not satisfactorily for this reason, and I want to point that out. We have in this country a need for a great deal of rubber. Synthetic rubber, of course, is being manufactured in sufficient quantities. But the grade of the products of our manufacturers is not as good as the consumers are entitled to and we should have more of the natural rubber. During the next 6 months—that is, from March 31 to September 30—in order for our manufacturers to get sufficient supply and so that they may build up in order to go ahead without danger of a market which will be critically short, they ought to have the Government continue its present program and only to that date. After September 30 there will be so much free crude rubber in the world to be purchased that I am told, and the evidence and hearings show, that the manufacturers can obtain it at a fair price.

But today the supply is so short that by the end of the second quarter, on June 30, there will be only 70,000 tons of rubber for industry use. That would be the margin. At the end of the third quarter, on September 30, that will have increased to 96,000, and thereafter it goes up rapidly to 224,000, and the manufacturers are in the clear.

Now, what does House Joint Resolution 118 offer? All it offers is freedom of purchase. Every manufacturer can go out and buy in a free market, according to what we are told, but that market has got to be a competitive market; in fact, every witness, so far as I recall, said that the price of rubber will go up in that market. Who is going to pay that increase in price? It is the consuming public of the United States. There is no reason for its going to unheard of or any higher prices than are absolutely necessary if we will only continue the present system until September 30, and that is the statement that the man who is now running the business for the United States Government, Mr. Sears, made. He says that the present purchase system is the best system.

Now, suppose we have 40 or 50 different companies going into the market and buying rubber, and there are 800 manufacturers that need crude rubber. How are the other 760 going to get their fair share of the crude rubber that is brought into this country? As a matter of fact, no program has been set up. There was some talk of its being an import license program, but the import license program is stricken out by the very words in this bill. How are they going to do it? They do not know. The people do know, however, what the program is today, and if we will continue it until September 30, we will not need to worry at all about any change in program.

The rest of the bill remains intact. The Government, of course, ought to, as we say, pass legislation for the development and use of the synthetic rubber industry which is now being operated by the United States Government. When the plants are sold or leased and operated properly, and a certain number of tons are being turned out, the trade, under some sort of specifications for the kind of tires sold, will use it all. We will have a $700,000,000 industry running along on a supply basis and a spare basis which will protect this Government against any emergency that is likely to arise in the next few years. Without doing that we will be in trouble, and Congress is not doing anything, apparently, about it. Now, if Congress had passed that kind of legislation we would not have to have this bill. Further than that, there would not be any further purchase by the Government of crude rubber. There will not be any need for House Joint Resolution 118 the moment the Government program for the synthetic rubber plants has been announced and carried into effect. Congress should act on this matter at an early date.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DEVITT].

Mr. DEVITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BROOKS. I have no further requests for time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, we find ourselves in the happy position of having all of the agencies of government coming to Congress and asking that we relieve them of the business of purchasing rubber in the open market for the use of the general trade in this country and letting our businessmen go back to their own ways of doing business as we followed in this country for some 160 years.

I think this is one of the finest opportunities in the world for Congress, and particularly for the party now in charge of the House and the Senate, insofar as the majority vote is concerned, to carry out some of our campaign pledges and get rid of some of these controls and let people run their own affairs.

For instance, here I have the direct testimony of John C. Houston, Commissioner of Civilian Production in the Office of Temporary Controls. May I say to my friend from Massachusetts, who has been quoting Mr. Sears so much, that this is the boss of Mr. Sears speaking. If you will read the testimony of Mr. Sears you will find that he was speaking as an individual and not as head of his division, and also as a former employee, for 9 years, from 1932 until 1941, of the United States Rubber Co. in Detroit, Mich. You will find that on page 862 of the hearings. I think you will also find that his old company was opposed to this resolution as here presented; in other words, his old company prefers to have the Government stay in the business of buying rubber, carry the inventory risks of the company, and saddle the cost, if there be any, on the taxpayers of the country, instead of letting private enterprise run its own business and carry its own risks and use its own judgment. Frankly, I do not give value to Mr. Sears' testimony. But this is what his boss said, Mr. John C. Houston:

> It is the opinion of the administration, and I speak specifically in this connection for Mr. Steelman, the Department of State, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the War and Navy Departments, the Department of Commerce, and the Office of Temporary Controls, that exclusive Government importation of natural rubber should be discontinued not later than March 31, 1947.

That is the end of this month.

> This matter has been given the most careful consideration by the agencies concerned with the public purchase program and they are in unanimous agreement that the ban on private imports is no longer justified and should end.

Let me say that talks right down my alley, because I do not like to have the Government doing my buying. I would prefer to use my own judgment any time I get ready to buy anything, whether it is rubber or something else.

Our friend from Massachusetts has further referred to the testimony of Mr. Sears, and I want to dwell on that just for a moment. On page 872 Mr. Sears says:

> I think that public purchase is perhaps the surest way.

He is not certain about the matter at all. Of course, this resolution prevents the further purchase of natural rubber on the part of the Government for the benefit of the regular rubber trade.

Mr. Sears says:

> Now, if we do not get our flow of rubber under public purchase—and experts far better qualified than I can give you information on that—then, we do not have the advantage that I have indicated. It is clear that our processes would be far easier, if we look to one source of supply.

Let us talk commodities for a few moments. Suppose you gentlemen over here on my left are suppliers of rubber. Here on my right are prospective purchasers of rubber. Would you prefer to sell to one single purchaser of rubber or would you prefer to have a market where you could distribute your products to many customers over a wide area, especially if you are facing into a rubber storm, as indicated by this testimony, which gives us satisfactory evidence that the supply of natural rubber will soon be back on the world market seeking a home in which to locate itself, instead of being a scarce article as it has been here in recent years. We know as well as we know anything from a commodity standpoint, that there will be plenty of raw rubber within another 6 to 12 to 18 months. The testimony of rubber experts before this committee shows that.

As you move into a declining market on a commodity, it is good business for you to unload your stocks and get out from under the market? Of course it is. Naturally it is good business for the United States Government to discontinue buying rubber at this time and let the rubber operators of this country assume their own market risks. Then they will be more careful in buying rubber. They would not load up so with heavy stocks of rubber. That would bear the market, and give still lower prices. But if we in Congress are so unintelligent on commodity markets as to keep the Government in the market and let the Government load up with 150,000 tons or 200,000 tons of rubber for the trade which the trade has not yet contracted to take off the hands of the Government, if the market then should break, for each 1 cent per pound drop in the price of rubber the Government, that is the taxpayers would lose on today's market about $2,200,000 on the 100,000 tons held by the Government.

Look at the enormous insurance and warehouse costs being imposed upon the taxpayers by reason of the Government purchases. No wonder the administration says, "Please take this responsibility off our shoulders and let the market go back to the men who run the market because supplies are going to be adequate."

Mr. Sears further pointed out here:

> I want to emphasize that the opinion I gave is a personal opinion only and not the official position of the agency I represent.

Mr. Sears, in cold-blooded, blunt language, is speaking for a rubber company. We might just as well be wise as to what goes on sometime. He did not commit his agency, he did not commit the Government, but committed his own personal opinion only. There a division head, if you please, is pleading for a continuation of a program which places the liability of a great market on the taxpayers of this country. He then expects this Congress to support a proposition of that kind when every agency of the Government, as has been pointed out by our distinguished chairman and the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], every agency of the Government, including the Army and Navy, says we do not need this program any longer. Of course, we should now get rid of it. There is not one single argument that you can make in favor of the continuation of the Government buying rubber that will hold water. I defy any man to stand up here and categorically set forth a single reason and support it by the records of what is going on.

If you will look at page 873 of the hearings, where the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] is interrogating Mr. Sears, you will note that Mr. Sears does not testify that the customers of the Government place a certified check in the hands of the Government before the rubber is purchased. Would the United States Rubber Co., for instance make contracts with the Government of the United States to take from the Government all rubber which the Government might buy for their account at whatever price the Government might pay when they and you know very well that you are moving into an adequate or heavy supply of rubber and that the market might break? Well, let me tell you the ingenuity and financial and economic ability of the United States Rubber Co. and the Goodrich Rubber Co. are too great to make loose contracts of that kind. When the Government goes out and buys merchandise, it does not generally get a certified check before the purchase is made. After the Government acquires a big stock pile and you come in and want to participate in that stock pile and want the Government to allocate you, let us say, 10,000 tons of rubber, in that case, of course, you will put up a certified check to carry out your contractual liability with the Government to the effect that you are going to purchase 10,000 tons of rubber and will take it off the hands of the Government.

If you did not do so then the Government would lose on the transaction by having committed itself to you. When you did not carry through with your contract the Government might lose under a specific contract of that kind. So altogether, the rubber companies do not have to carry the market risk if the Government carries that market risk for them.

Now, going further with respect to this whole proposition, this resolution sets in motion the machinery for permanent legislation which is to follow. To deal with what? To deal with this question of what we are going to do with the synthetic rubber industry. You have got reasonable rubber prices today because you have an insurance policy in the form of a three-quarters-of-a-billion dollar synthetic rubber industry which can turn out so much synthetic rubber that you are somewhat independent of the other fellow's raw rubber producing forces. As long as you have that insurance policy in the form of that industry that can produce three-quarters of the amount of rubber we use per annum, you will have a good insurance policy. But when you destroy the synthetic rubber industry you immediately become dependent upon the economic interests of the Dutch, the French, and the British in the Far East. You become dependent upon constant shipping services across wide oceans. Those shipping services fail. In addition, you become dependent upon land operated in off-shore areas, and shipment therefrom. So we found out as an incident to this past war that we could not get rubber, so we built a synthetic rubber industry.

Now you have many synthetic-rubber plants. What are you going to do with them? Are you going to sell them for junk? Are you going to keep them operating? Are you going to let the Government hold them in a standby position? Are you going to discontinue the manufacture of synthetic rubber in this country and again become totally dependent upon the raw-rubber supply from the Far East? Are you going to give protection to our friend from Michigan if he says, "I will buy one of your rubber plants and I will continue to produce synthetic rubber for this country provided you protect me against a drop in crude rubber that would put me out of business"? What are you going to do about the question of protection of the man who buys a synthetic-rubber plant and keeps rubber in production? Are we going to authorize Government agencies to say to our people, "You shall use annually a minimum of 250,000 or 350,000 or 450,000 tons of synthetic rubber in order to keep the plants operating"; in order to induce people to buy plants and operate them privately? Are we going to have those plants as Government property and lease them to operating companies, where Messrs. A, B, and C come along and organize and operate a company and lease those plants from the Government on certain terms, and go out and produce synthetic rubber for the use of our people? What are we going to do about such questions? This resolution provides a temporary program which is to be continued until permanent legislation can be worked out by the Congress after full hearings and full study of this entire proposition. That is what this resolution is about. It carries on the temporary program and sets up the machinery so that we may do this permanent thing at a later date.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] has expired.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is exactly what we should do. For the time being, let the Government allocate the rubber which it is getting in, so that Mr. A will use a certain amount of synthetic rubber with the raw rubber which he gets. That keeps the synthetic-rubber business going. In other words, it is an end-use control such as we followed all during the war, where we would specify to people, "You may have so much of a certain kind of material providing you produce a certain amount of goods according to Government specifications."

We allocated material all across this country throughout the war, material which the Government never owned, which the Government at no time purchased, and we did it through inventory controls and through the end-use control. This resolution provides that the allocation of rubber, synthetic and natural, shall be made by the Federal Government until we get this permanent legislation set up and in operation so that we can go ahead and run the synthetic industry and also continue the use of natural rubber.

As has been stated during the course of this debate, you have got to do some of those things to provide that the different segments of the rubber industry, that means the various manufacturers may have their full share of whatever rubber is available in the meantime.

I call your attention now to page 899 of the hearings. On that and subsequent pages you will find a great number of telegrams sent to me from members of the rubber-manufacturing industry in support of this bill. You will also find many telegrams and messages and letters sent to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER]. You will find copies of letters and telegrams sent to other members of the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], for instance. Some 65 or 70 small rubber manufacturers wanted the Government to get out of the purchase of rubber so that they would have a better chance to survive.

Going back to the illustration I used with respect to selling rubber to a single purchaser, if you have other purchasers of rubber competing with the Federal Government in the far eastern rubber market the individual purchasers representing other countries can act with more speed than the Federal Government acts, and they can siphon off the high quality rubber in greater quantities than our people here in the United States would be able to get under a Government purchase plan. We are not now getting the rubber to which we are entitled in quantity, we are not now getting the quality of rubber to which we are entitled. Unless we watch our step, rubber buyers from other countries can get the best quality rubber, process it into rubber goods, ship it to this country and take our markets away from us right under our own noses here in our own front yard, because the single operator can operate more expeditiously than the Federal Government.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. SHAFER. The gentleman was a member of the Inter-Agency Policy Committee, was he not?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I was.

Mr. SHAFER. What were the short-term recommendations of that committee?

Mr. CRAWFORD. As a matter of fact, that committee recommended that these controls on buying be taken off as far back as December 31. Then we recommended that they be taken off on January 31; but the gentleman from the White House, Mr. Steelman, carried those controls on. Now, however, under the statement of Mr. Houston that I read just a few moments ago, Mr. Steelman and those people have come to the conclusion that these controls should now be taken off.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It seems to me, therefore, that by every rule of reason the Congress should enact House Joint Resolution 118, send it on the way to the other body in order that this whole matter can be taken care of before March 31, and so we can decontrol the Government's participation in the purchase of rubber and go ahead with other matters.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true that the rubber purchasing program should have been discontinued as of the 31st of December 1946, as was recommended by various agencies of the Government?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not a fact that the Army and the Navy, the State Department, and the Munitions Board all recommend the discontinuance of this program by the 31st of March?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is correct—all agencies of the Government.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it not a fact that every other nation in the whole world has abandoned government purchase of rubber, outside of the United States?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think we are the only one that continues it, and we are losing every day by continuing it.

Mr. BROOKS. And those nations abandoned it as of January 1?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Now, if we want to continue this program in the interest of the four big rubber companies, Goodyear, Seiberling, Goodrich, and one other, the United States Rubber Co.

Mr. SHORT. Firestone? Harvey Firestone, Jr., is emphatically against our continuing the Government in the purchase of rubber. He stands out alone I believe you will find of the Big Five. Firestone came before the committee and pled with us to discontinue it.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. If this resolution is enacted by the Congress, it will be in accordance with the policies of the Republican Party that the Government get out of business immediately?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It certainly is and here is one of the greatest opportunities we will have, where the administration is joining with us in that effort.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time to propound a query of the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER]. I note that section 2A of this bill provides the authority for allocation, specification, and inventory control. It further provides:

> It is hereby directed that the powers, functions, duties, and authority under the provisions so continued shall be exercised and performed until that date.

May I ask if this means that the Congress is directing that all three of the methods of exercising this authority—allocation, specification, and inventory control—must be exercised over all natural and synthetic rubber and rubber products until the expiration date?

Mr. SHAFER. No; Mr. Chairman. This is intended to mean that the control shall be exercised to the extent necessary to accomplish the purpose of the act. Whenever the agency responsible for administering these controls determines that a particular control is no longer necessa y to carry out the purposes of the act the control may and should be rescinded.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan a further question. I notice this bill uses the word "crude" in referring to tree, vine, and shrub rubber, whereas the existing regulations employ the term "natural rubber." Is it intended that these terms are synonymous?

Mr. SHAFER. Yes. The term "crude rubber" is intended to mean the same as natural rubber.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no other requests for time the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc.—

FINDINGS OF FACT AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

SECTION 1. (a) Crude rubber, which includes all forms and types of tree, vine, and shrub rubber, is a highly strategic and critical material, deficient and incapable, as a result of climatic conditions in the United States, of sufficient development as a natural resource of the United States in quantities adequate to supply the industrial, military, and naval needs of the country for the common defense. Crude rubber is at present in short supply and is expected to continue in short supply for some months to come, and thus the supplies of crude rubber must be augmented by the use of large quantities of synthetic rubber, a product of chemical synthesis.

Congress, in the enactment of the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act (Public Law 520, 79th Cong.), has heretofore declared it the policy of the United States and the purpose of that act to provide for the acquisition and retention of stocks of strategic and critical materials, including crude rubber, so as to prevent so far as possible a dangerous and costly dependence of the United States upon foreign nations for supplies of these materials in times of national emergency. Further, crude rubber, when stock-piled and held in storage, must be rotated and replaced from time to time by equivalent quantities of fresh material. By reason of the foregoing, a program with respect to rubber must be devised which will supplement that heretofore adopted in the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act.

(b) It is the policy of the United States that there shall be maintained at all times in the interest of the national security and common defense, in addition to stock piles of crude rubber which are to be acquired, rotated, and retained pursuant to the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act (Public Law 520, 79th Cong., approved July 23, 1946), a technologically advanced and rapid expandible domestic rubber-producing industry of sufficient productive capacity to assure the availability in times of national emergency of adequate supplies of domestically produced rubber to meet the industrial, military, and naval needs of the country.

(c) It is necessary in the public interest and to promote the national defense (1) that Congress make a thorough study and investigation of means of accomplishing such policy through the enactment of permanent legislation, the study and investigation to be completed within such time as will permit the legislation to be enacted, if possible, during the first session of the Eightieth Congress; and (2) that, pending the enactment of such permanent legislation, the United States continue to allocate crude rubber and crude-rubber products and the authority of the United States to manufacture and sell synthetic rubber be temporarily continued.

Mr. SHAFER (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be printed in the RECORD at this point, and that amendments may be in order to any portion thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The remainder of the bill is as follows:

TEMPORARY RETENTION OF CERTAIN EMERGENCY POWERS WITH RESPECT TO RUBBER

SEC. 2. To effectuate the purposes set forth in section 1 (c) hereof—

(a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the provisions of section 2 (a) of the act of June 28, 1940, entitled "An act to expedite national defense and for other purposes" (54 Stat. 676), as amended, shall continue in force until the effective date of permanent legislation enacted to accomplish the policy set forth in section 1 (b) hereof, but in no event beyond March 31, 1948, insofar as such provisions authorize allocations of crude rubber and crude-rubber products (except import control of crude rubber), and it is hereby directed that the powers, functions, duties, and authority under the provisions so continued shall be exercised and performed until that date: Provided, That the President may allocate crude rubber and crude-rubber products in the public interest and to carry out the purposes of this act, notwithstanding any changes in the supply or estimated supply of crude rubber.

(b) The powers, functions, duties, and authority of the United States to manufacture and sell synthetic rubber shall continue in force until the effective date of permanent legislation enacted to accomplish the policy set forth in section 1 (b) hereof, but in no event beyond March 31, 1948, and as so continued it is hereby directed that they shall be exercised and performed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation while that Corporation has succession, and thereafter by such officer, agency, or instrumentality of the United States as the President may designate.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 3, line 12, strike out the words "if possible."

On page 3, line 15, after the word "continue", strike out the words "to allocate" and substitute in lieu thereof the words "allocation, specification, and inventory controls of."

On page 3, line 15, after the word "crude", add the words "and synthetic."

On page 3, line 15, after the second appearance of the word "crude", add the words "and synthetic."

On page 3, line 17, strike out the word "temporarily."

On page 4, line 5, after the word "authorize", strike out the word "allocations" and substitute in lieu thereof the words "allocation, specification, and inventory controls."

On page 4, line 5, after the word "crude", add the words "and synthetic."

On page 4, line 5, after the second appearance of the word "crude", add the words "and synthetic."

On page 4, line 10, after the word "may", strike out the word "allocate" and substitute in lieu thereof the words "continue allocation, specification, and inventory control of."

On page 4, line 10, after the word "crude", add the words "and synthetic."

On page 4, line 10, after the word "and", strike out the words "crude-rubber" and substitute in lieu thereof the words "crude and synthetic rubber."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLASON:

On page 3, line 18, after the word "to", insert the words "act as the sole purchaser and seller of crude rubber and to."

Page 2, line 19, strike out the word "temporary."

On page 4, in lines 8 and 9, strike out the words in parentheses.

On page 5, add a new paragraph as follows:

"(c) The powers, duties, and functions and authority of the United States to act as the sole purchaser and seller of crude rubber to be used in the United States shall continue in force until the effective date of permanent legislation enacted to accomplish the policy set forth in section 1 (b) hereof, but in no event beyond September 30, 1947; and as so continued it is hereby directed that it shall be exercised and performed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation while that Corporation has succession, and thereafter by such officer, agency, or instrumentality of the United States as the President may designate."

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment, as I stated before, is to carry on the purchase of crude rubber with the United States Government as the sole purchaser, with absolutely equitable distribution to all manufacturing plants in the United States that need crude rubber, for the further period up to September 30, 1947. Every witness has stated that the present program of the United States Government is being carried out satisfactorily and successfully. I do not think there is any question about it. We won the war with this particular program being carried on. Now that the war is over, we find that for the next 6 months, according to the records of the United States Government, there will be a considerable shortage of crude rubber coming into the United States. Nevertheless, overseas the crude rubber will be coming onto the market at the rate of 100,000 tons a month. The people in the United States need about 50,000 tons of that, together with the products of our synthetic plants. These 50,000 tons a month, according to the great majority of the men familiar with the rubber industry—and they are the ones who testified and whose words are in these hearings—will be sufficient. The manufacturers are satisfied they will be able to get all of the crude rubber they need if the United States continues its buying program. If this buying program is lifted, they believe, and their testimony so shows, the price will go up. The man who will lose is the American consumer, the man who has to buy the tires, the pair of rubbers, or the rubber coat. Higher prices lead to less employment. We can and should avoid this result.

In view of the fact that this program is working successfully, is in operation, and everybody knows just how it is being carried out, in view of the fact the United States Government cannot lose a cent, because it gets a certified check from each purchaser before it buys the crude rubber, and because of the fact that the small manufacturers get absolutely their fair proportion in accordance with the plant capacity now existing of each manufacturer, I believe this amendment should be adopted. I believe that on September 30 there will be a sufficient supply of crude rubber in the United States to relieve any anxiety about such a stringent shortage as to create a runaway price of rubber.

After the last war rubber did go to $1.23 a pound, or a dollar above the price at which the Government is now selling it to the manufacturers after adding the Government cost to the price paid to the seller. The seller is getting a good price today because crude rubber can be laid down in New York City at a profit at 12 cents a pound, and our Government is offering 20¼ cents. We are getting the quality of rubber to which we are entitled because it is an open market. In rubber markets the rubber is sold on the basis of you take the poor along with the good. For the extraordinarily good-quality rubbers, the more expensive rubbers like latex, you have to pay more, and the Government is paying a premium at the present time to the seller.

As I see the whole proposition, we have today a working program. We are waiting for the United States, acting through this Congress, to tell what kind of operation our synthetic plants shall have, whether they are to be sold or operated by the Government or by private industry. We are waiting for the Congress to tell us what is going to be done. The manufacturers are ready, willing, and anxious to go along with the Government. They ask for fair play. The majority of them want this amendment, as was shown by the testimony in the hearings.

I was interested in what the gentleman who introduced this resolution said. He indicated that Mr. Sears' former employer was in favor of his resolution and not in favor of this amendment. As a matter of fact, anyone can look at the testimony of Mr. Tisdale, the vice president of the United States Rubber Co. his former employer, and see that the United States Rubber Co., Goodrich, Goodyear, and Seiberling, which is a smaller company and does not buy in the east through its own agents—all of this group wish to have this amendment in the bill. The reason is that it will protect the United States consumers, the people of the United States. No one can be injured but the man who pays the last price, and the man who pays the last price is the man who gets the products. There are 800 manufacturing plants. They cannot go overseas and buy. The big people have their buyers over there, and they are going to be taken care of. There is going to be a lot of trouble in attempting to change to a new policy of allocation. We do not have to make that change. I believe we ought to adopt this amendment.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the question of extending the present controls over rubber, both in buying and allocation, was thoroughly considered by the subcommittee. Voluminous testimony was heard and also was considered by the full Committee on Armed Services. The testimony shows that we are not getting quality rubber under Government purchasing. The United States had a quota of 150,000 tons for January and February. If you read the hearings you will see where we were only able to obtain 26,000 tons in January and 13,000 during most of February. Those figures are up to the time that we began holding the hearings the latter part of February. In other words, we were able to obtain only 52,000 tons and we were supposed to get 100,000 tons. That was because our Government had placed a ceiling of 20.25 cents per pound on rubber. All of the other nations were outbidding us one-eighth of a cent per pound. What rubber we did get was of a poor quality. That was the testimony throughout the hearings.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says that prices rose after the First World War. Prices of rubber went up to the amount that he quoted in 1925. They dropped following the First World War. There was not a rubber man before our committee who predicted high prices for rubber if we stopped Government buying. Those who did testify along that line stated that there might be a slight rise in prices but the fact that we would get more crude rubber would control the prices.

Just remember that every agency of the Government, and I would say the majority of manufacturers in this country, want House Joint Resolution 118 without amendment. The gentleman who preceded me should read the hearings before making the statement that the majority are opposed to this resolution. There are plenty of manufacturers in his own district listed in the hearings who want House Joint Resolution 118. I have many letters from Massachusetts, incidentally, who favor House Joint Resolution 118.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHAFER. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. Practically every witness testified that if we removed these Government controls or took the Government out of the purchase of rubber, we would be able to get more rubber, and that of a much better quality than we have been able to get in recent years.

Mr. SHAFER. That is correct.

Mr. SHORT. And competition in an open and free market will automatically take care of the price.

Mr. SHAFER. That is correct.

May I read you what the War Department has to say on this:

> That the exclusive Government purchase and import control of crude rubber are no longer necessary in order to provide security to our synthetic rubber industry.

Here is what the State Department said:

> The Department of State prefers House Joint Resolution 118, introduced by Mr. CRAWFORD, in the belief it more closely reflects the desire both of the Congress and of the executive branch of Government that wartime controls be eliminated as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Committee will vote down this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLASON].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PLOESER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 118, pursuant to House Resolution 144, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MCDONOUGH asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by Mr. Vicente Villamin.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DEVITT] is recognized for 15 minutes.

WE MUST HAVE AN AFFIRMATIVE FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. DEVITT. Mr. Speaker, I had planned to talk with my colleagues of the House today about St. Patrick, famous patron saint of the Irish people. On this anniversary of his birth I wanted to tell again the interesting story of St. Patrick's life and activities in converting the once barbaric Irish to the Christian religion. March 17 is always a fitting day to relate St. Patrick's experiences in driving the snakes from Ireland and instilling a righteous "fear of the Lord" in the Celtic people.

The contributions which the Irish people have made to the history and growth of this country are legion, and we of Irish blood are prone on this day to shout to the high heavens how glorious are the feats and accomplishments of Irish-Americans. Today, however, I put aside all pride of racial origin and speak with you as an American—an American deeply concerned about the course of world affairs and the part which the people of the United States must take in those affairs.

Last week the President of the United States came into this Chamber and requested the backing of the Congress in rendering assistance to Greece and Turkey. Let me say at the outset that I shall vote for that assistance. The President has stated facts which, on their face, justify our rendering aid in support of the Greek and Turkish Governments. In my judgment we have no choice.

I am fully aware of the possible awful consequences of such action. It is true that giving aid may well lead, eventually, to war. But what is the alternative? It is to do nothing! And if we do nothing, what will happen? Then without question the Greek Government will fall and the last remaining vistage of democratic hope in the Balkans will fall with it. Red elements will assume the reins of government, and one more country in the world will be listed on the side of the Communists.

And as Greece goes, so goes Turkey. That courageous little country would perforce, soon succumb to a communistically controlled government. This would undoubtedly be followed by Communist control of the Straits of the Dardanelles.

With the fall of Greece and Turkey, the entire eastern Mediterranean would come under the control of the communistic governments. It would simply be a matter of time before, in succession, North Africa, Italy, and France would take on outright left-wing governments. Eventually perhaps even the Low Countries and the Scandinavian nations would, because of pressure of their environment, follow suit. Then the world would truly be divided into two distinct camps with Communist Russia heading the one and democratic United States heading the other.

So, when I say that the requested action to help Greece and Turkey may well lead to war, I am well aware of the fact that our failure to help them may well lead to a quicker and more devastating war with more disadvantages to us and more advantage to the potential aggressor.

This is a question of balancing the evils and choosing the lesser. There is here no clear choice between good and bad.

We need plain speaking and resolute action in our foreign affairs. For too long a time, now, have our foreign affairs been a mere "balancing of expediences" between possible courses of action. We have lacked thoughtful direction. In the past our foreign policy has been based on "negation." We have been against many things, but very seldom have we been for other things. We must be positive. We must be affirmative in our future foreign policy. The President's forthright action in appearing before this Congress with a definite request for aid for these governments is an example of the open-faced, affirmative kind of foreign relations which this country must follow in the future.

We are now a grown-up country with grown-up power and influence. We are the country of the world. No longer should we tag after the foreign policy line laid down by the British, or the French, or any other country. No longer should we refrain from formulating and enunciating our own foreign policy until the effectiveness of our eventual course has been lost because of indecision and tardiness.

The United States should enunciate an affirmative world policy now into which our conduct in future crises can be consistently fitted. We must have our international course clearly charted so that we ourselves, and those who deal with us, will know what our probable future action will be. The time to do this is now, because now is the time when the need is greatest. It is not only in Greece and Turkey, but in Korea and China, in India and Hungary, in Rumania, in Austria, and in Germany, and elsewhere that we have the potentials for difficult international problems which must be solved and in their solution, the intelligent leadership of the United States must be felt.

The United States is an idealistic country. It is a Christian country. It possesses the highest principles of morals and justice, and its peoples are blessed with the milk of goodness and human kindness. When a new, affirmative foreign policy is shaped by our Government, it is of the utmost importance that it be based on the idealism so characteristic of the American people. We need intellectual and moral vigor in our world leadership for future peace and happiness, and the United States is the nation which can and must furnish that kind of leadership.

I hope, therefore, that the President's action last week in clearly enunciating this country's vital interest in the Greek and Turkish matters will be only the first in a series of subsequent statements and actions which will form a pattern of United States policy based on the best of our American morality and idealism. The people of the United States, and the people of the world, are looking to this Government to lead in the establishment of our high, idealistic principles in the councils of the world. We cannot fail them.

I do not visualize that we will go to war with Russia tomorrow, or the next day, or at any time for that matter. But I think it is absolutely essential in preventing war that the potential combatants clearly understand and appreciate the motives and the ideals of each other. To this end we must exercise our utmost in understanding the Russian people. We likewise must make sure that the Russians understand the motives, ideals, and principles which we cherish. Experience indicates that these can best be conveyed to the Soviets by our wholehearted subscription to the policy of firmness enunciated by our former able Secretary of State, James F. Byrnes, and restated with commendable frankness last week by President Truman before this body. I urge that our future foreign policy be characterized by this same frank firmness in the interest of perpetual world peace.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous special order, the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART] is recognized for 30 minutes.

RUSSIA

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of common knowledge that the Russian Government, though requested on at least four occasions, has refused to render an account to us, as required under the terms of the lend-lease agreement between Russia and the United States.

Rumors are flying thick and fast that this reticence is inspired by far more than just a mere delay in replying might imply. Does it mean that Russia is preparing a counterclaim arising out of the old controversies of yesteryears?

Is she coming forward with the old claim to reimbursement of what she contends was that old bill for hundreds of millions of dollars arising out of our invasion of her territories following World War I?

Or is she planning to assert a claim for the return of Alaska, raising a question of the legality of the sale of Alaska to the United States? Or even, perhaps, demanding its return?

In the light of the President's special message of last Wednesday in which he stresses the importance of standing guard over the Dardanelles, of bolstering the defenses against communism of both the Turks and the Greeks, is it not of equal importance that we give thought to our defenses in the far North, of Alaska, of, perhaps, Greenland, as well? Military strategists tell us that the next attack will come over the top of the world.

It is admitted by the well informed that the present status of Alaska constitutes one of the gravest problems confronting United States diplomacy.

From a variety of sources comes information which clearly indicates that Soviet Russia is looking at Alaska with covetous eyes. Does she plan to claim a much greater price for that territory than was originally paid? Or does she plan to repossess herself of that treasure house of the far North?

Startling as this may be, it is no more startling than the arguments used by Russians in claiming sovereignty over this territory. And bear in mind that Alaska is conceded to be the key to the defense of the United States in this atomic age.

The Russians claim the Czar had no right to sell Alaska to the United States in 1867.

The Communists claim the price we paid for Alaska, $7,200,000, was in reality but reimbursement of expenses incurred by the then Czar in sending his fleets to New York and San Francisco in 1863, when the Union cause was hanging perilously in the balance.

They claim that this Russian naval demonstration overawed France and England, both of whom were at that time trying to force Lincoln to agree to an armistice, as they planned the recognition of the Confederate States as a free and independent nation. The Bolsheviks, however, insisted that this Russian action thereby averted what might have become a fatal blow to the Union cause. And there is sound basis for this.

The time has arrived to bring this problem into the open. Alaska is on a direct line between potential aggressors and our industrial centers. It goes without saying Alaska should be fortified so that it shall become an impregnable barrier to any predatory power or group of powers that might have plans to challenge our sovereignty there.

The American people have a right to know what, if any, secret conversations have been held between our diplomats and the Russians on this important problem. Our State Department, for the record, denied to me that representations have been made, either by the Soviet Government or the Soviet press, indicating they have claims to make against Alaska or any other of our territories.

However, if memory serves, we were told there were no secret agreements made during the Yalta and Tehran Conferences. Later we learned to our amazement that our leaders had in fact made secret agreements of colossal importance at those conferences. And those secret agreements in many instances had to do with the liberties of peoples who have demonstrated their ability and deep-seated desire to govern themselves.

Back in 1939, the New York Times carried a statement that:

> Pravda stated Alaska was sold to the United States by the Czar without the consent of the Russian people.

As recently as last August, a correspondent for one of the great American news services wrote while on a tour of Alaska:

> The Soviets never have conceded the Czar's right to sell Alaska. Russian airmen and seamen stationed in Alaska during World War II openly referred to it as Russian territory.

In another article dated Point Barrow, where the Navy has found oil in its petroleum reserve, this same correspondent wrote:

> Russia's attitude if Point Barrow becomes a second Iran is an unknown factor. Native Alaskans have been told for many years that Russia does not admit legality of the Czar's sale of Alaska in 1867. An authority who spent 3 years at Cold Bay supervising the transfer of lend-lease ships to the Russians said he failed to contact one Russian officer who did not refer to Alaska as Soviet territory. Throughout the war Russians stationed in Alaska contended that the United States had occupied St. Lawrence Island—midway between Alaska and Siberia in the Bering Sea—illegally since it is not mentioned specifically in the purchase agreement. Heads of Russian missions in Alaska argued the purchase price of $7,200,000 is proof the sale was not made in good faith.

There is much other material of a similar nature of record to indicate Russia's state of mind. And it is disquieting.

A distinguished figure in the field of diplomacy, former Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles has strongly criticized the State Department policy of keeping Americans in the dark on its key activities. And well might he, for, indeed, frankness is not an attribute of those who manage our foreign relations.

May I quote an example of the type of equivocation our State Department feels free to practice when it wishes to obscure the facts of its dealings with foreign powers?

The questions I am about to read you date back 80 years but the parallel with the kind of double talk the State Department gives the American people today is remarkable. But it has a very important bearing upon the issues I am now presenting.

Secretary of State William H. Seward wrote to the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1868 requesting ratification of the Alaska purchase treaty. He said:

> Probably this treaty stands alone in the history of diplomacy as an important treaty conceived, initiated, prosecuted and completed without being preceded or attended by protocols or dispatches.

Seward was explaining the negotiations were entirely on the basis of oral conversations with the Russian minister in Washington and hence his department had no records of notes exchanged between Washington and St. Petersburg.

Now as an example of diplomatic double talk we have a letter written by Seward to a man in Washington Territory. Seward wrote:

> In your letter of the 26th ultimo you say that you have seen it stated in a Sitka paper that the "$7,000,000 we were supposed to have paid for Alaska was really given to Russia to pay the expenses of her friendly naval demonstration * * * to counteract the supposed hostile intentions of England and France; that Russia * * * ceded to us Alaska, which she no longer wanted and it was made to appear that Alaska was bought and sold." You desire to be informed of the correctness of these statements. In reply I have to say that no confirmation of these statements is found on record in this department.

That is an excellent example of diplomatic double talk. Of course, there was no record in his department. Seward took pride in his letter to the Senate in stating there were no records; that the negotiations were entirely oral. Note how Seward conveyed the impression that the cost of the Russian naval demonstration was not a part of the purchase of Alaska. But he didn't deny it though he tried to make it appear he was denying it. He just said there were no records to that effect.

Seward deserves all credit for negotiating the purchase of Alaska. Whether, as the Russians claim, it was thrown in as earnest in a deal involving repayment of the expense of maintaining the Russian fleet in American waters is beside the point. The duly constituted government of Russia did, in fact, cede Alaska to us in a legal transaction. And both parties were satisfied at the time.

The record shows, in fact, that Alaska was regarded by Russia as a liability at that time. Our congressional leaders were moved to ratify the treaty largely out of good will for Russia, gratitude to her for her support of our cause in the Civil War.

Representative Loughridge of Iowa, then an influential Member of the House, explained it this way, writing the following:

> Had it not been for the peculiar circumstances of this case, not the least of which is the friendship shown us by Russia in the dark days of the rebellion, I should have felt like * * * defeating the treaty.

Our consul general in Paris, John Bigelow, wrote:

> Of course neither Mr. Seward nor Mr. Bodisco—
> Russian diplomat in Washington—
> said distinctly to me that the purchase—
> Of Alaska—
> was made purely and simply as a gracious recognition on the part of the Washington Government of the attitude of the Czar toward the United States in 1862. But I doubt that there was any Member of either House * * * who supposed the Government then had any other motive * * * than to recognize the obligation to the Czar, or that, as territory, it had any other value except of ridding us of an alien neighbor.

Seward himself, in a memorandum transmitting the treaty to the Senate for ratification, wrote:

The late Civil War * * * was marked at its very beginning by demonstrations of sympathy and solicitude for the stability of the Union on the part of Russia. * * * It was verbally understood between the two Governments that the United States would be at liberty * * * to carry prizes into Russian ports. No Confederate agent was ever received or encouraged or entertained at St. Petersburg. The visit of the Russian fleet to the United States in the winter of 1863 was intended by the Emperor and was accepted by the United States as a demonstration of respect and good will and resulted in an increase of mutual regard and sympathy.

Russia's Atlantic fleet, commanded by Rear Adm. Lisoviskii, reached New York September 24, 1863. The Pacific fleet, under Rear Adm. Popov, anchored in San Francisco Bay October 12 of the same year.

Victor J. Farrar, in his Annexation of Russian America to the United States, writes:

The United States believed they—came to aid the United States in the event of hostilities with England and France. The fleets arrived at the high tide of the Confederacy, and England and France hesitated to recognize the Confederacy until it was too late; hence, the United States regarded the fleets as a factor in the concatenation of events which saved the Union.

Gideon Welles, then Secretary of the Navy, wrote:

The Russian fleet * * * are now in New York * * * there is something significant. What will be its effect on French policy we shall learn in due time. * * * God bless the Russians.

Farrar also wrote:

Admiral Popov gave orders that if Confederate men-of-war should put into San Francisco, the fleet should clear for action. * * * If the Confederate vessel should open fire, it should be ordered to leave San Francisco, and if it should refuse, then it should be attacked.

It is really impossible to estimate the importance which the amity-toward-Russia sentiment played in the purchase of Alaska; first, in securing ratification by the Senate; second, in securing an appropriation of $7,200,000 by the House.

The New York Times printed an interesting letter from one Ernest T. Lewis in 1939. He wrote:

After the Civil War, my grandfather used to tell us, the United States received a bill from the Imperial Russian Government for $6,000,000. My grandfather was Eleazar Lewis, spiritual adviser to Secretary Seward. A way had to be found to pay the bill. There was Alaska, which nobody wanted. Russia valued Alaska at $1,200,000. So we bought it for $7,200,000 at a time when the country was practically bankrupt.

Franklin K. Lane, member of Woodrow Wilson's Cabinet, wrote:

Secretary Seward secured from Russia a demonstration in American ports of Russian friendship. Her ships of war sailed to both our coasts with the understanding that the expense of this demonstration would be met by the United States out of the contingent fund. It was to be a secret matter.

The war came to a close and immediately thereafter Lincoln was assassinated and the administration changed. It was no longer possible to pay for this demonstration secretly under the excuse of war. But a way was found for paying Russia through the purchase of Alaska.

I have presented this documentary material primarily to outline the basis on which Russians claim our purchase of Alaska was illegal. Actually there is not one scintilla of evidence that our purchase of this territory was illegal. It was entirely legal. But does Russia plan to reopen this old question? Is she seeking a casus belli?

Seward did drive a shrewd bargain with the czar's representative, Edouard de Stoecke—and we honor his memory for it. If the purchase price also represented the cost of the czar's naval demonstration, well and good, but, let it not be forgotten that we paid cash for what we got.

We are confronted today by a situation which calls for taking the American people into our confidence. They deserve all of the facts on a matter of vital concern to them. If there is anything brewing behind the silken curtains of our State Department, the American people are entitled to know it. Did the President tell us everything when he appeared before us last week?

All of the arguments in behalf of secret diplomacy do not alter the fact that corruption flourishes in darkness. There would be fewer wars if the people were kept fully informed of the state of our international relations.

Today, after a second disastrous war in less than 30 years, we have abundant evidence of the need for open covenants openly arrived at as Woodrow Wilson demanded. Our diplomats have proven their inability to preserve the peace through the pursuit of their methods of secrecy and evasion. Our heroic dead, now resting in cemeteries throughout the world, are mute evidence of this. Is it not time to chart a franker course.

It is high time, it strikes me, that the sage and considered advice of Sumner Welles is taken unto the hearts of those who hold in the palms of their hands the destiny of the Republic, the happiness and well-being of the people who compose it.

Let us be done with secrecy.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEARHART. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PLUMLEY. What was the price actually paid, did the gentleman say?

Mr. GEARHART. The price actually paid by appropriation by Congress was $7,200,000.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Where did that $200,000 come into the picture?

Mr. GEARHART. There is ample evidence in the historical record of that transaction that that $200,000 was paid to agents in the employ of the Russian Government, who negotiated the sale.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BISHOP). The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

PROGRAM FOR TOMORROW

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, of course tomorrow the Private Calendar will be called. That was announced as part of the program for the week. In addition, we propose to call up tomorrow, after the call of the Private Calendar, H. R. 2535, a bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PLOESER], reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is a matter of considerable urgency.

I make this announcement in order that the RECORD will show that that will be taken up tomorrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SMITH of Ohio asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a speech which he broadcast over the Columbia Broadcasting System last Friday.

Mr. GAVIN asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Oil City Derrick.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE] is recognized for 15 minutes.

RISING COST OF LIVING

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the death of price controls left the American housewife a tragic heritage. The Republican Party, as surgeon, advised the removal of controls in order that alleged economic ills of this Nation might be cured. The patient died. The time has come for a word of explanation from Republican doctors.

The American people were assured that the action removing governmental commodity-price restraints, was in the interest of the general welfare of our citizens. Unrestrained promises, lightly dropped from unthinking lips, pictured increased production at reduced consumer prices. The utopia of plenty at low cost was to be the legacy of each American once price controls were dead. Americans again would be able to live according to American standards within family income, was the promise made.

The American family is suffering from the destruction of price control executed by the Republican Party. This suffering is acute, real, not imaginary. During the few months which have passed since controls were forced to be lifted, commodity prices in America have risen to the highest levels in history.

The statistics are appalling. Steak 73 cents a pound, butter 80 cents a pound, pork about to reach $1 a pound. Eggs 80 cents a dozen. The price of clothing, when available, is almost prohibitive. Men's shirts—low at $3.95—shorts and undershirts $1.50—suits $50–$75. The price of bread? A survey of United States cities under date of March 9 showed that increased cost of ingredients combined with overseas demand for wheat and flour have resulted in price advances for a loaf of bread. The price increases noted during the recent advance in wheat varied from one-half cent to 3 cents, depending upon the size of the loaf. New England bakeries advanced prices both wholesale and retail on a 1-pound, 9-ounce, loaf from 13 to 14 cents, and predictions are that there will be an additional increase of 1 cent a loaf within a short time. One of the sharpest advances, of 3 cents, was reported at Atlanta, Ga., on a chain store 24-ounce loaf, raising the price to 17 cents. The 16-ounce loaf now sells at 13 cents, a 2-cent increase. Pittsburgh, Detroit, Grand Rapids, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus, Ohio, Los Angeles—have seen these price increases in bread.

A comparison with the living costs in Canada is highly instructive. The Canadian dollar has a valuation in New York of approximately 36 cents. Its purchasing value in Canada, however, is considerably greater than that of the United States dollar in the United States, according to comparative figures prepared by the Wartime Prices Paid Board. This is particularly true with respect to food prices, under control in Canada. Milk is retailed at 12 to 16 cents a quart in Canadian cities, compared with 22 to 26 cents a quart in northern United States. Butter, selling at 41 to 46 cents a pound, costs 75 to 91 cents in cities like Seattle, Minneapolis, and Syracuse. Egg costs in Canada of 44 to 53 cents compare to American costs of 53 to 67 cents. First grade white flour 69 and 93 cents for a 24-pound sack, against $1.65 to $2.13 for 25 pounds. These figures were compiled during January 1947, by actual visits to representative stores in cities of comparable population, proving that across-the-board food costs were lower in Canada than in the United States.

The health of this Nation is threatened. The time has come for Republicans to justify the prescription which premeditatedly killed the patient. The American people are entitled to know the basic reasoning which warranted the murder of the only means which would prevent inflation, prohibitive costs, and protect the home life of our citizens. Could it be that lobbyism was responsible? Could it be that subservience to big business was responsible? Is the answer that the Republicans believed that invested capital, in the name of patriotism and loyalty to country, would resist the opportunity to exploit the repressed consumer public as soon as the morning sun of full production without price control rose over the horizon of the market place?

There was nothing new in the situation facing this country at the termination of hostilities of World War II. We had the experience of World War I. Legislators knew the problem. The arguments that price control stifled production and elimination of control would release consumer goods were not even plausible. The Republican promise that buyer resistance would keep price rises within modest limits was intentionally fallacious. Big business cares little for the suffering caused by the inability of the man in the street to pay increased prices for his daily bread. To be sure stockholders must be served—invested capital must be protected. But the American family must be protected and preserved.

The free competitive system is the soundest economy for a free people to possess, but I oppose and condemn the evils of this system, such as monopolistic control of the arteries of industry and the sinews of labor. Capital and labor in this Nation can and must live side by side in harmonious relationship if America is to remain a great international power. Capital and labor are mutually dependent, one upon the other. But vested interest cannot, by virtue of its own power, impose upon the less fortunate prices for necessities of life which can only be met by the man in the street by borrowing and more borrowing with its inevitable tragic results.

The removal of price controls for the sake of removal of price controls—a theoretical objective without consideration of the realities of the problem which faced America at the close of World War II—has resulted in a spiraling of prices beyond the financial capacity of the American consumer. The responsibility for this action rests upon the Republican Party. Empty promises of Republican leaders provide neither food nor clothes at the fair prices they promised.

The American people realize that no explanation worthy of consideration can emanate from a Republican Party suffering internal revolt, divided against itself, confused as to American needs and demands, actuated by personal desires for national prominence and prestige, irrespective of the price to be paid by our citizenry.

The picture is not pretty. Examine the plight of the American housewife since price controls were killed by the Republican Party.

Prices spurted the very first day after price control was ended, and the second day, and the third day. They climbed the first week, the second week, and the third week. During the fourth week the new law went into effect and prices leveled off, while the campaign for meat decontrol gained momentum. Prices leveled, but did not fall back to June levels. New rules prevented; mandatory decontrol and mandatory increases supported higher prices.

Where was the American housewife at the end of the year? Retail meat prices 50 percent higher than in June, the price of butter, lard, other fats and oils, up, not by half, but by two-thirds on the average. These were the "modest" increases bequeathed the American consumer 6 months after the death of price control. Milk cost 4 to 5 cents more a quart—increases of one-third to one-half. The mothers of America cannot understand this rise and its harmful effect upon the life of this Nation.

In a word, Mr. Speaker, the American public has been treated to a rise of consumer prices averaging out at 15 percent. That rise, taking place between June and December, just 6 months, is equal to the rise over the 49 months between May 1942, when the General Maximum Price Regulation went into effect, and June 1946, when effective control was destroyed. In the wholesale and spot markets a really spectacular price increase has taken place. Rises of 100, 200, 300 percent, and more. Even at retail, where the housewife has to pay the bill or do without, the rise has been eight times as rapid as was permitted under price control prior to June 1946. These prices continue to soar.

How about production—meat production—about which we heard so much only a few weeks ago? Total production for the second half of 1946 fell below the total for the second half of 1945. The same is true for the final 3 months of 1946. Higher prices failed to provide more meat. Higher costs to consumers meant a bigger take for sellers. Prognostication for 1947 indicates that meat production might run 4 percent above 1946. In a word, a 50-percent rise in price and maybe 4 percent more meat.

How about other production? Everyone knows that we turned the reconversion corner at the end of 1945. The Private Business Committee for Economic Development joined with Government agencies in hailing that achievement. Production, which under price control had broken all records during the war, was strengthening under price control. The setbacks in February and May marred, but did not really change the picture. Production has continued its climb, the climb that began 7 months before price control was wrecked.

Despite industrial production at levels nearly 90 percent above prewar, the consumers of this country are still waiting for the price declines that they were promised would come in a reasonable time. Instead, they see commodity prices rising day after day, with sharp spurts in wheat and hogs, and many metals at new record levels. As those prices are translated into wholesale and retail prices, they still mean higher costs of living, smaller purchasing power for the consumer dollar.

The killers of price control have not made good their promises to the American people. They know it and the people know it. The National Association of Manufacturers, which assured the country that decontrol would bring the goods you want at prices you can afford to pay, now admits that prices are higher than people can afford to pay. The NAM, fearful of new wage demands but conscious of how fully justified those demands are, has called instead for a lowering of prices.

But the trend is still upward. The NAM made my Republican colleagues in Congress listen last June, but it cannot make business listen now. Let us remember that as we hear the real-estate lobby today.

These are statements of fact, not theory. The American people must realize that the unnecessary raid on the pocketbook of the consumer was instigated by those who believe that big business, not small business and the rank and file of American labor, will save the world. The present-day inability of homemakers of fixed income, whether clerk or professional man, laborer or annuitant, to maintain a decent standard of living in accord with the American way of life is attributable solely to those who sought increased influence through increased grants of special privilege.

There is a mounting pressure for removal of the last remaining price controls—rent, sugar, rice.

There is an answer to the financial hardships which threaten the American consumer.

The Republican leadership has failed in this trust.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusettts [Mr. PHILBIN], is recognized for 20 minutes.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, throughout the whole world, wherever men and women of Irish blood may be on this great day, they pause in their day's occupation and turn their minds back to the beloved Emerald Isle to render their heartfelt tribute of affection and reverence to the great Saint, scholar, and patriot, St. Patrick, and to thoughts of the virtues of Old Erin, the matchless courage of her sons and daughters who have served every noble cause, to its beautiful poetry and music, to its glorious history, its proud heritage, and its magnificent and unexcelled contributions to civilization.

As a great Irish poet sung:

O Erin! O my mother! I will love thee
Whether upon thy green Atlantic throne
Thou sitt'st august, majestic, and sublime
Or on thy empire's last remaining fragment
Bendest forlorn, dejected and forsaken
Thy smiles, thy tears, thy blessings and thy woes
Thy glory, and thy infamy, be mine.

That no race has ever excelled the courage of the Irish, few men would care to deny. No people have ever exceeded their love of God, their loyalty to Christianity, their fierce and burning love of liberty. No race has paid a higher price for freedom than the Irish. "Whether in chains or in laurels," their sacrifices, their sufferings, their indomitable fighting spirit have "known nothing but victory."

I could not possibly measure the contributions of the Irish race and people of Irish blood to our beloved America. The blood of their sons has saturated the battleground of every American war. Irish-American war heroes are legion. Their devotion and loyalty to our Nation have known no bounds. They have been in the vanguard by the hundreds of thousands, yes; by the millions, whenever our country and its institutions were in danger. It is not possible for me to measure the great gifts of life, treasure, energy, and ability which people of Irish blood have unselfishly bestowed in order to promote the building of America and to enhance our national welfare.

In every field of endeavor, in every calling, profession, and business, from the holy sanctuaries of the church where her sons have so nobly ministered to the pleas and urgent spiritual needs of suffering humanity, before the bar, in the arts and sciences, in the marts of trade and commerce, in solemn judicial tribunals, to the Halls of Congress and legislative chambers throughout the land, the Irish-American has known no peer. Always in the thickest of the fight, always ready to serve and to act in the face of gravest danger without thought of self, the Irish have demonstrated a superb and vitalizing quality of patriotism that certainly no other group of our people can excell. Even in 1788 the Irish-American Chronicler, Matthew Carey, was able to say:

From northern Quebec where Montgomery fell
To Georgia's most southerly scene
Each State has beheld, each commander can tell
How brave have our countrymen been.

And that has been true throughout our entire history.

Broad, tolerant and just, devoted to democratic ideals, the Irish have ever defended the faith of Christ and the political truths of our American forefathers. They have striven and fought for toleration and justice and equal opportunity for all and have been willing always to lay down their lives and spill their precious blood to realize these great aims. They will continue to do so as the years go on and we build a greater and more glorious America.

Even now as the forces of godless communism and destruction stalk through the world and infiltrate into our own country, the Irish-American and the faith he embraces constitute an impassable barrier against the penetration of the evil ideology which would corrupt and poison the lifestream of the American Republic. The Irish-American will never surrender to atheism or communism or any other un-American concept. Like his ancestors of old, he will fight and die, if necessary, in defense of the precious principles of freedom to which he is so passionately attached, and which he has lived by throughout the centuries. His Americanism is of the very highest order.

It is appropriate, therefore, that on this day hallowed in the minds and hearts of every true Irishman, that I should pause to pay my brief tribute to the great patron saint who has inspired Irish devotion and heroism throughout the ages and who will, in the time to come, God willing, continue to strengthen the determination of those who revere him, to labor and fight for God and country and the sacred principles of American freedom.

It is also fitting on this occasion that I should read to this house a splendid editorial entitled "St. Patrick's Day" written by Harry H. Schlacht, which appeared today in the Boston Record.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

(By Harry H. Schlacht)

"May the road rise to meet you, may the wind be always at your back and may God hold you in the hollow of his hand."

—An Irish Prayer.

This is a great day for the Irish.
This is a great day for the shamrock.
This is Saint Patrick's Day.
Let our eyes dance with joy.
Let our hearts beat with pride.
Let our happiness reign supreme, as we weave the shamrock into a garland of glory for the Emerald Isle.

"O Ireland, isn't it grand you look,
Like a bride in her rich adorning,
And with all the pent-up love in my heart,
I bid you the top of the morning."

It is the land of scholars. It is the abode of poetry, it is the cradle of heroes. It is the nursery of liberty. It is the home of martyrs. It is the isle of the immortal saint.

It is a country with the heart of a child and the smile of a god.

Nowhere is the sky more radiant, nowhere is the air more blithe. Nowhere is the sun more mellow than the sky that smiles. Than the air that blows. Than the sun that shines upon the ancient isle.

You can see the earthly flowers of springtime, revealing their beauty above the green sod of the verdant sea-locked isle. You can see the enameled meads light up the radiance of the moontide's golden showers.

You can see the bewitching beauty of her mountain tops.

You can see the enticing loveliness of her landscapes.

The heathers bloom upon the hillside. The roses blush in the valleys. The birds caroling in every glen. God has truly blessed Ireland.

Today there is a tear mingled with the smile of an Irishman.

Today there flashes upon the canvas of his memory the joys and sorrows of Ireland.

He dwells upon the folklore and fairy tales. He tells of the charm of Killarney's lakes and fells. He speaks of the refreshing waters of the Shannon. He hears the melody of the harp that rings through Tara's Hall. He recalls the joyous music of the pipers in the hush of the twilight. He feels the warmth of a crackling fire on a winter night.

Who has not been thrilled by the Irish Lullaby, or the inspiring tunes of Tara's Hall, the Minstrel Boy, the Wearing of the Green, When Irish Eyes Are Smiling, My Wild Irish Rose, and Mother Machree?

St. Patrick symbolizes the highest conception of faith, hope, and charity.

He unfolded the story of his life on the tablets of the human heart.

He made the highways and byways his pulpit.

He illustrated the principles of Trinity by plucking a shamrock from the roadside and using the three leaves on the one stem to convey his religious concepts.

For the shamrock is the symbol of unity and marks the union of one God and three divine persons.

For more than 1,400 years the Irish have held aloft for all the world to see the torch of liberty.

They are ardent believers in tolerance. They are stalwart champions of democracy. They bring everywhere love of and belief in God. They spurn every form of human enslavement. They give strength and vitality to our Nation.

The sun never ceases to shine on the grave of an Irishman.

If we were a painter we would make the portrait eloquent with the deeds of as brave a people as has ever lived. The historical records of our country abound with the stirring saga of their achievement on all the blood-bought battlefields and on the seven seas.

The heroic Irish have written their names with imperishable grandeur upon the pages of our history.

Let us recite here the story of the glory of Irish contribution to the majesty of our Nation.

They fought courageously under George Washington in the war for independence.

They fought for the preservation of the Union, under General Meagher at the Battle of Fredericksburg.

They fought at the Alamo in Texas and at Custer's last stand at Little Big Horn in Montana.

Washington's password was "Saint Patrick."

John Hancock was the first to affix his signature to the Declaration of Independence. John Rutledge was the first to address the Continental Congress. Charles Thomson was the first secretary of that historic body. John Nixon was the first to read our sacred Declaration. Patrick Henry and Matthews Lyons were the eloquent orators of the Colonies.

Robert Morris helped finance the American Revolution. John Barry was the first commodore of the United States Navy. Twelve signers of the Declaration of Independence and 11 of Washington's generals were of Irish lineage.

Irish blood flowed in six Presidents of the United States. They were Andrew Jackson, James K. Polk, James Buchanan, Chester A. Arthur, William McKinley, and Woodrow Wilson.

Let us remember Robert Fulton and his Clermont; Cyrus McCormick and his reaper; John Holland and his submarine; Victor Herbert and his immortal compositions; John T. McCormack and his golden voice; and the other great Irish men and women who have enriched and ennobled the life of our country.

In the War of 1812, Oliver Hazard Perry and Thomas Donough were the two naval heroes, as was the other peerless leader, Andrew Jackson.

In the Civil War there were General Meade, victor at Gettysburg; Gen. Philip Kearney, Gen. Philip Sheridan, Gen. Patrick Meagher, and other Irish heroes.

Memory adds lustre to the heroism in World War I. Let us mention but a few: "Wild Bill" Donovan, Father Duffy, Joyce Kilmer, and Gen. Alec Anderson.

Pride whispers in lullaby tones the great Irish heroes of World War II: Colin Kelly, "Commando" Kelly, "Point Blank" Callaghan, Conroy, McGuire, Devereux, Finn, Flaherty, O'Donnell, and McAuliffe, and others too numerous to mention.

The first American to receive a Presidential citation was James Powers. The first American pilot to bomb Berlin was William P. O'Brien.

The first American glider to land on D-day was piloted by Lt. Col. Michael Murphy. The first American to liberate Bataan was Lt. John F. Murphy. The first American mother to lose five sons was Mrs. Thomas P. Sullivan.

The fighting Irish have been the bulwark and strength of America.

So long as the world's records revere the narrative of Saint Patrick's mission; so long as the waters of the lovely Shannon shall gently flow to the sea; so long as the beautiful Lakes of Killarney shall reflect upon their bosoms the blue vaults of the heavens—so long will men and women of the Irish race love their ancient isle, revere their saint, cherish the shamrock, and uphold the principles of national freedom and individual liberty.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

191. By Mr. BUCK: Petition of Edith E. Wilson, Helen D. Gavitte, Blanche Johnson, May E. Meachen, Nellie M. Warren, Mabel V. Johnson, Alice J. Digon, Edith Grafmuller, Laura M. Colenso, Elsie Olsen, Jennie Jones, Anita Fischer, Mabel S. Holland, Shirley S. Beasley, Nena M. Jones, Elizabeth K. Dole, Anne Salvesen, Edith E. Johnson, Mabel Grill, Vash L. Lucker, all from Staten Island, N. Y., asking support of House bill 142, the Pace bill. The boys tell some pretty "terrible" stories of conditions, and we, as citizens, can do nothing. We have to depend on our representatives in State and country to vote for the care of our men and boys; to the Committee on the Armed Forces.

192. By Mr. McGARVEY: Petition of Kendall H. Shoyer, chairman of the Registration Commission of the City of Philadelphia, opposing any increase in post-card rates. The registration commission has noted a news item in the daily press to the effect that the Post Office Department may seek to increase the post-card rate from 1 cent to 2 cents.

As we do a considerable part of our work by the use of penny post cards, we should dislike very much to see this expense item doubled. For instance, when we conduct a city-wide mail check, which we do every year, we have at the outset an expense of $10,000 for post cards. Our annual vote purge means another item of $1,000 each year, so you can readily see what an increase in the penny-post-card rate will do to our budget.

If you have an opportunity to express our opposition to any increase we would appreciate it; to the Committee on Post Offices and Civil Service.

193. By Mr. FORAND: Resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations requesting the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States to use every effort to prevent the United States Navy from dispossessing veteran families from Tonomy Hill housing project to provide housing for the personnel of the Atlantic Fleet and their families, soon to be based in Newport, R. I., passed by the general assembly on the 6th day of March A. D. 1947; to the Committee on Armed Services.

194. By Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana: Memorial No. 8 of the Montana Legislature for an act of Congress or such other authority as may be necessary to allow veterans of World War II just concluded, to acquire submarginal lands from the Department of Agriculture or the Department of the Interior which have been acquired under act of Congress dated July 22, 1937, known as chapter 517, title III, section 32 (50 Stat. 525–526); to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

195. By Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts: Petition of Leslie H. Morgan and 1,489 citizens of Massachusetts, advocating repeal of Public Law 572, Seventy-ninth Congress; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

196. By Mr. NORBLAD: Memorial No. 2 adopted by the Forty-fourth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, memorializing the Congress to repeal title 16, United States Code Annotated, section 485, and so much of of title 16, United States Code Annotated, section 516, as may be necessary to restrict the acquisition of national forest lands solely to such lands as may be acquired by appropriation of money from the Federal Treasury; to the Committee on Public Lands.

197. By Mrs. NORTON: Petition of assembly No. 274, Slovak Catholic Sokol, fraternal, gymnastic, and athletic organization, Bayonne, N. J., requesting and urging a full congressional investigation of the whole Czechoslovak question; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

198. By Mr. RICH: Petition of a group of retired teachers of Lycoming County, Pa., urging early and favorable action on House bill 1613; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

199. By Mr. ROBERTSON: Memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, memorializing the Congress of the United States to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America, endorsing equal rights for women; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

200. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, demanding the removal of all controls over boxcar supply and distribution and allowing railroads to govern and allocate such equipment according to the needs of its patrons; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

201. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, memorializing the Congress of the United States to provide funds for the payment of the difference between the ceiling price on flax and the price obtainable after the ceiling had been lifted; to the Committee on Agriculture.

202. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, memorializing Congress to construct a psychopathic hospital for veterans in the State of North Dakota, and until such time as such hospital is constructed to pay for the transportation charges for the commitment of psychopathic veterans to governmental institutions in adjoining States; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

203. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, memorializing the Congress of the United States to create a Roosevelt Memorial Park in the Bad Lands area of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Public Lands.

204. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, memorializing the Congress of the United States to continue and expand the development of rural electrification throughout the United States; to the Committee on Agriculture.

205. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation barring all forms of liquor advertising from interstate mails, from radio and motion-picture programs; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

206. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, memorializing the Civil Aeronautics Board for early consideration in providing a northern area of the United States as the crow flies from Duluth, Minn., to Seattle, Wash., with regular air transportation serving Chicago via the Twin Cities and Duluth and the intermediate points of Grand Forks, Devils Lake, Minot, Williston, Glasgow, Havre, Great Falls, Kalispell, and Spokane; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

207. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, memorializing the Congress of the United States to open for homestead entry the submarginal lands in the State of North Dakota for the benefit and rehabilitation of veterans of World War II; to the Committee on Public Lands.

208. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, expressing the support of the people of North Dakota for the development of the Missouri River and its tributaries, and petitioning Congress to continue its support; to the Committee on Public Works.

209. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, memorializing the Congress of the United States to extend the time for availability of funds under the Federal Aid Act of 1944; to the Committee on Public Works.

210. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, petitioning Congress to strengthen present sanitary requirements governing the importation of livestock and livestock products and to appropriate additional funds to the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, in order that border inspection may be improved and a system of patrol established along the northern boundary of Mexico to guard against the importation of people, animals, and materials carrying the infection of foot-and-mouth disease, and also petitioning Congress to offer to the Government of the Republic of Mexico such facilities as may be available from the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, and appropriating money to provide for such facilities and to extend aid to the Government of the Republic of Mexico in order that foot-and-mouth disease may be eradicated; to the Committee on Agriculture.

211. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, urging the enactment of House bill 1113 of the Eightieth Congress, authorizing the removal of restrictions by the United States Government on land and land interests of Indian veterans; to the Committee on Public Lands.

212. Also, memorial of the thirtieth legislative assembly, State of North Dakota, petitioning Congress to enact permanent legislation to maintain a floor of not less than 90 percent of parity on all basic farm crops; to the Committee on Agriculture.

213. By Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin: Petition of Ladies' Wreath 104 of the Slovak Catholic Sokol, Kenosha, Wis.; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

214. By the SPEAKER: Petition of city council of Baltimore, petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to a resolution requesting the United States Congress to build and maintain a modern American fleet; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

215. Also, petition of the First Catholic Slovak Union of the United States of America, petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to a full congressional investigation of the whole Czechoslovak question; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

216. Also, petition of John Jacob Janzen, petitioning consideration of his resolution with reference to his claim against Russia and the Russian people; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

217. Also, petition of Olga Morenoff and others, petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to opposition to the 1-cent increase in the local gasoline tax; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

218. Also, petition of Robert W. Estris and others of Washington, D. C., petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to opposing the 1-cent increase in the local gasoline tax; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

219. Also, petition of William Goldwyn and others of Washington, D. C., petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to opposing the 1-cent increase in the local gasoline tax; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

220. Also, petition of secretary, the Architects League of Northern New Jersey, petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to all Federal controls affecting building, building materials, and supplies, including the Civilian Production Administration, be wiped out; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

SENATE

TUESDAY, MARCH 18, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 19, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, who dost know every secret of our hearts—all that we fear, all that we hope, and all of which we are ashamed—in this moment of confession, as each man looks into his own heart and mind, have mercy upon us all, and make us clean inside, that in all we do today we may behave with true courtesy and honor.

Compel us to be just and honest in all our dealings.

Let our motives be above suspicion.

Let our word be our bond.

Let us be kind in our criticism of others, and slow to judge, knowing that we ourselves must one day be judged.

We pray for a new spirit to come upon us that we may be able to do more and better work. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, March 17, 1947, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Swanson, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 276) to provide for payment and settlement of mileage and other travel-allowance accounts of military personnel.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

A letter from the Acting Postmaster General, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize certain administrative expenses in the Post Office Department, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Civil Service.

CANCELLATION OF UNPAID IRRIGATION OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE ASSESSMENTS AGAINST CERTAIN INDIAN LAND

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a copy of an order canceling $766.87 of unpaid irrigation operation and maintenance assessments against Indian-owned land under the Fort Hall irrigation project, Fort Hall Indian Reservation, Idaho (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Lands.

INTRUSION OF POLITICS INTO BIPARTISAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. DONNELL obtained the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make a brief statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I regret the necessity of making this statement at this critical moment when partisan politics should be totally removed from foreign-policy consideration. But I am unable to ignore the unfortunate implications in the letter and statement released last night by the executive director of the Democratic National Committee calling upon the chairman of the Republican National Committee to join in a party statement endorsing the so-called Truman policy in Greece and Turkey. The Democratic chairman repeatedly used my name in his letter and statement. Of course, this was without my knowledge. It is unavoidable that I should speak plainly as a result.

Mr. President, when bipartisan foreign policy gets into the rival hands of partisan national committees it is in grave danger of losing its precious character. No matter how worthy the announced intentions, it can put foreign policy squarely into politics which, under such circumstances, are no longer calculated to stop at the water's edge. However unwittingly, this is precisely what Mr. Sullivan invites. I hope Mr. Reece will not accept the invitation. He has faithfully kept his party out of foreign-policy politics. I am sure he will continue to do so.

Bipartisan foreign policy is not the result of political coercion but of nonpolitical conviction. I never have even pretended to speak for my party in my foreign-policy activities. I have relied upon the validity of my actions to command whatever support they may deserve. I have never made any semblance of a partisan demand for support and I never shall. What I decline to do myself I cannot permit the executive director of the Democratic National Committee to attempt in my name.

It also is necessary, now, to get the record straight. This bipartisan foreign policy has been confined within relatively narrow limits. It has applied to the United Nations. It has applied to peace treaties in Europe. It has applied to nothing else. I have had nothing to do, for example, with China policies or pan-American policies except within the United Nations, and at times I have been satisfied with neither. The first I ever heard of the Greco-Turkish policy was when the President disclosed his thoughts 10 days ago at the White House. I do not complain. But I do not propose to be misunderstood.

I have said that we have no safe alternative but to uphold the President's hands at this dangerous hour. But I have also said that total information must be made available to Congress and the country, and that Congress must completely explore and approve the means by which the President's policy is to be implemented.

I expect every Republican, like every Democrat, to respond to his own conscience. I expect all of them to act not as partisans but as Americans. I expect none of them to yield their judgments, at such an hour, to the political dictates of any party managers. On the latter basis, bipartisan foreign policy would die in revolt. I hope we may avoid that tragedy. The quicker last night's appeal, no matter how nobly meditated, is forgotten the better it will be for the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have listened to the remarks of the Senator from Michigan, and I heartily corroborate his statement about the nonpartisan or bipartisan approach to the questions he has mentioned, namely, the United Nations charter and its operations, and the European peace treaties.

Mr. President, I hope that policy may continue uninfluenced by partisan or political circumstances. Until I read the newspapers this morning, I never heard of the letter addressed by Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Reece; but I wish to say that, so far as I am personally concerned, neither Mr. Sullivan nor Mr. Reece can influence my action in regard to matters within the jurisdiction of the Senate and within the sphere of my own views and convictions. I assume other Senators will take a similar attitude. I think it would be most unfortunate for any Senator, especially for the Senator from Michigan, to allow an incident of this kind in any wise to affect his attitude or his conduct with regard to the main question now before the Congress.

I have had very fervent hope that the Greco-Turkish matter would be handled on a nonpartisan basis. I know that shortly after the President addressed the Congress, the Senator from Michigan, as he stated here today, expressed his intention and desire to stand by the President; and I know of other prominent Republicans—I merely refer to them as "Republicans" for purposes of identification, not in any partisan sense—who also heartily expressed their purpose to stand by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, the issue is before us; we must determine it; we must act upon it, and I think it is of the highest importance that we act upon it as soon as possible, with due consideration, of course, to all the aspects and questions involved.

I have no criticism of the statement of the Senator from Michigan that there should be full and complete information on the subject. Without speaking for Mr. Sullivan or anyone else, my own personal view is that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations should proceed at the earliest possible date to open hearings on this question, and not delay and wait until the House of Representatives acts upon it. I think I can speak without fear of serious contradiction when I say that, as a rule, the people of the United States look to the United States Senate for leadership in international matters and for the enunciation of policies relating to foreign relations, because the Senate ratifies treaties, confirms the appointments of ambassadors and ministers, and, generally, acts on matters having to do with international relations.

I do not think we should wait on the House of Representatives; I do not think the Senate should wait until the House completes its own deliberations, perhaps after extended hearings and the propounding of multitudinous questions, and then take up the matter, probably to go over the same ground. I see no reason why the Senate should not proceed with hearings simultaneously, if necessary, with the House of Representatives. There is no reason why a witness who appears before the House committee should not, when he has concluded his testimony there, come before the Senate committee, or vice versa.

I have no objection to the fullest exploration of all phases of the proposal, but I think the questions should be propounded and the necessary information elicited in the hearings. I understand a questionnaire is being circulated, and to that I make no serious objection, except that it invites replies to many questions the answers to which will be known to all of us without the questionnaire.

Mr. President, I have no sponsorship for the letter written by Mr. Sullivan. He did not consult me about it, and I do not know that he consulted anybody else. I see no occasion or reason for the Senate to become excited or worried in any way about what Mr. Sullivan did, or about what Mr. Reece did. Both of them are paid propagandists for their parties. In their zeal they will no doubt from time to time do many things which are unwise and foolish, and we should not be influenced, in deciding the highly important international questions now before us, by what men like Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Reece may do.

Mr. President, I solemnly insist we ought to proceed in the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations with hearings upon this matter at the earliest possible date. What will a delay mean in the foreign chancelories, particularly at Moscow, where General Marshall is struggling with the treaties with Austria and with Germany? Delay here will mean, in the view of the foreign officials, at least, that there is substantial division among the people of the United States as to whether or not they will support the President. The Russian press is already proclaiming, by reason of a statement or two by Mr. Wallace and others, that there is substantial opposition. That means, of course, according to their view, that our people are not wholeheartedly behind the President.

Reference is made to the new policy. It is new in part only. We made loans to Great Britain. She was our ally, and one might say, one of the liberated countries. No questions were raised as to that loan such as those now suggested. We made a loan of a billion dollars to France, to prevent confusion and chaos which we thought might result from the spread of communism in France. That was largely the purpose of the loan. We made to Italy, who was first our enemy and then later our collaborator, a loan of many hundred millions of dollars. For what purpose was that loan made? It was made to prevent hunger and confusion and misery, which offer a fertile seedbed for communism. We were trying to protect the Italian Government against a spread of communism, and perhaps, the destruction of the Italian Government and Italian institutions.

So, Mr. President, coming to the case of Greece, all of us know that of all the European countries Greece is perhaps the most deserving of our assistance and of a loan. Greece was devastated, Greece was conquered, Greece was occupied; but early in the war the gallant Greeks fought with great heroism against the Italians, and successfully held them for a considerable period of time.

From what has been disclosed by travelers and official personnel who have been in Greece, it is common knowledge that Greece is in a deplorable state. She has been irritated and annoyed along her northern boundaries touching upon Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and Albania. A commission of the United Nations is on the ground at this time, investigating these border incidents, in an effort to determine where the fault lies.

Greece is deserving of our every consideration, of our assistance, and of whatever we may do to bolster up the spirit of her people, to bolster up her means of self-defense. That, Mr. President, is what is involved. All that is involved is to help Greece maintain her position and to maintain her army for domestic purposes only.

In conclusion, I reiterate the statement that I feel it to be the duty of the Senate to proceed promptly with the consideration of this matter. Let the questions come; nobody objects to that. Let all the questionnaires which are being circulated be answered in the hearings. I trust that Senators will insist upon our meeting this question, and meeting it fairly, without waiting upon the leadership of the House of Representatives, in this field that is so peculiarly within the function of the Senate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the merits of the pending program this morning. I have no quarrel with the statement made by the Senator from Texas except—and this is no quarrel—that I think the pending problem involves far wider implications than he has indicated. I deal this morning solely with the problem which we confront, which was raised in my original statement. I entirely agree with the Senator from Texas that the actions of Mr. Sullivan or of Mr. Reece should have no influence, and they will have no influence upon the attitudes of the Congress. Certainly I indicated in my statement no purpose to be influenced one way or the other.

But, Mr. President, so far as proceeding immediately with the consideration of the problem is concerned, I reject the suggestion that the process which the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations has initiated is in any sense "a failure to meet the issue," quoting the Senator from Texas. The proposal which is now in process of development for the first time in the procedural consideration of such questions gives every individual Member of the Senate a right to put down on paper the questions which are bothering his heart and soul and mind, and to expect definite and specific answers to them. So far as I am concerned, the mobilization of this information, which was undertaken within 20 minutes after the President of the United States had delivered his message, is a very definite and specific action moving in the direction of meeting our responsibilities.

The able Senator from Texas says that I have invited questions the answers to which we know in advance. I do not believe that is the situation. Questions have been submitted to me which I could not answer, and I have questions the answers to which I do not know. It seems to me that in a situation of this nature the fullest possible complete information is what the country and the Congress require, and I am sure my able friend from Texas thoroughly underwrites that statement. It is purely a question of procedure.

So far as the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee is concerned, he is perfectly willing to start public hearings the moment the answers to these questionnaires are available; but he considers that it is an orderly process of a new magnitude in the business of getting information to complete the responses of the State Department to the questions which the members of this body desire to submit. I am hopeful that the questions will be completed by tomorrow, and that the answers will be available within 48 hours. There can be public hearings immediately. There is no suggestion in anything which I have said or indicated which invites any notion that there is any purpose to delay the forward march to an intelligent decision upon this utterly vital question.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me so I may propound a question to the distinguished Senator from Michigan?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ELLENDER. I was not present in the Chamber and did not hear all the Senator from Michigan said. I ask the Senator from Michigan whether all the questions and answers the Senator spoke of will be made public?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, they will be.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missiouri yield to me so I may propound a question to the Senator from Michigan with respect to the questionnaires?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Are the questionnaires in the hands of the clerk of the Committee on Foreign Relations submitted to all Members of the United States Senate?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, indeed. The invitation is extended to all Members of the United States Senate to prepare their own questions.

Mr. LUCAS. I see. I did not understand what they were. I thought perhaps some form of questionnaire had been submitted.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not at all. I am not making a poll. I am merely desirous of giving to the Members of this body a chance to search their own minds and hearts and souls and put down in black and white the things which are bothering them that might be answered by a categorical reply from the State Department.

Mr. LUCAS. What the Senator is saying is that if any Senators desire to submit questions concerning this problem they are at liberty to do so?

Mr. VANDENBERG. They are not only at liberty but are urged to do so.

Mr. HATCH subsequently said: Mr. President, late as the hour is, I feel that I want to make a brief observation concerning some comments which were made earlier in the day relative to an article which appeared in the morning press, a letter written by the executive director of the Democratic National Committee to the chairman of the Republican National Committee, Mr. Reece, in which, according to press dispatches, Mr. Sullivan is said to have urged the Republican National Committee to join in support of the present foreign policy.

Mr. President, when I, myself, read the article at first, it occurred to me that perhaps it was an unwise and an improper approach, that perhaps it did smack of bringing partisan influences to bear upon what should always be a bipartisan matter, and it was with sincere regret that I heard the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] today express his strong feeling about the letter saying at least he thought it was unwise and improper, and perhaps had placed him in a most embarrassing position. I regret that, because the Senator from Michigan has rendered most valuable aid and service to his country and to the world in his strictly nonpartisan and also his bipartisan approach to all matters relating to foreign policies and foreign relations.

But, Mr. President, after reading the letter, it occurred to me, and probably it is true, that it was with the best of intentions that Mr. Sullivan wrote as he did, and that he hoped to unite the two great political parties behind the present program in the field of foreign relations.

Therefore, Mr. President, lest what some may think an ineptitude of approach may cause an exchange of correspondence, statements, or views, which might tend to be destructive of that unity of thought and purpose which must prevail in our relations with other nations of the world, I take this opportunity to utter a word of caution.

I take this position, Mr. President, and I hold the view, that the course which has recently been proposed by the President is one which cannot be avoided. In a sense it was thrust upon us by circumstances over which we had no control; but, having embarked upon the course—and we have embarked upon it already—we can only maintain our position of influence, our position of leadership in world affairs, by complete and total unity at home. Anything which serves to divide us into groups, factions, or political parties, will destroy the ends we hope to achieve before we have commenced the journey toward those aims. Once let the ugly head of partisan politics be raised on this issue and there can be but one outcome, and that will be an inglorious and ignoble retreat by the statesmen of America from the battlefields won and conquered by the fighting men of America.

Upon the subject of what our course should be in the present and in the future, and how we shall pursue it, I shall expect to say more when the appropriate measures are before the Senate for consideration; but now I only raise my voice in protest against division, against discord, against partisan political influences no matter from which side they come. No matter where fault or blame may rest—with that I am not now concerned—the point I stress is that no matter what Members of Congress may think as individuals, and although we may honestly differ as individual Senators, we dare not divide along political or party lines. Let that occur and not only have we actually lost the war in which our sons gave their lives but we have lost the peace as well, and are promoting another war to be won by the men who fight and give their lives, as they did in World War I and World War II and perhaps to be lost by statesmen as was the First World War.

Whatever may be the outcome of the great debate upon which we shall presently enter, no matter what decision may ultimately be reached, let it be the decision of Americans and not of Republicans or of Democrats.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may be permitted to be in session this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] may be excused from attendance upon sessions of the Senate today and tomorrow. This request is made because of illness in the Senator's family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

MEETING OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, before notice of the Tuesday session, that is, today's session of the Senate, was received I had arranged for a hearing to be held by a subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia. Witnesses had been invited, and they were in attendance at a hearing this morning. They expect to remain and testify this afternoon. I should very much appreciate it if I could receive unanimous consent which would permit the hearings to continue, making it necessary for only three Senators to be absent from the Senate this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A memorial of sundry students and trainees, ex-service and ex-trainees, and veterans of World War II, remonstrating against certain amendments relating to vocational rehabilitation and education of veterans made by the Seventy-ninth Congress to the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. MURRAY:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"Senate Joint Memorial 1

"Senate joint memorial entitled 'A joint memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Montana, to the Honorable J. A. Krug, Secretary of the Department of the Interior of the United States; the Honorable Director of the National Park Service; the Honorable Director of the Public Roads Administration; the Honorable James E. Murray, and the Honorable Zales N. Ecton, United States Senators from Montana; and to the Honorable Wesley A. D'Ewart, and the Honorable Mike Mansfield, Congressmen from Montana, respectfully urging that necessary, sufficient, and proper appropriations be made and provided from the appropriation authorized by Public Law 521, Seventy-eighth Congress, chapter 626, second session, for the construction, reconstruction, improvement, betterment, and maintenance of the Yellowstone National Park Monument approach road, leading from the city or Red Lodge, Mont., to the northeast entrance of the Yellowstone National Park, which road is known as the Red Lodge-Cooke City Highway, and in order that said road may be kept in such condition that more extended use may be made thereof by the traveling public'

"To the Honorable J. A. Krug, Secretary of the Department of the Interior of the United States; the Honorable Director of the National Park Service; the Honorable Director of the Public Roads Administration, the Honorable James E. Murray, and the Honorable Zales N. Ecton, United States Senators from Montana; and to the Honorable Wesley A. D'Ewart and the Honorable Mike Mansfield, Congressmen from Montana:

"Whereas the National Park Monument Approach Road, leading from the city of Red Lodge, Mont., to the northeast entrance of Yellowstone National Park, which road is known as the Red Lodge-Cooke City Highway, was constructed by the Department of the Interior through the National Park Service under the act of Congress of January 31, 1931 (46 Stat. 1053), as amended; and

"Whereas said highway is a part of United States Highway No. 12, leading from the northeast entrance of the Yellowstone National Park northeasterly through the city of Red Lodge, Mont., and connecting with United States Highway No. 310 at Rockvale, Mont., and United States Highway No. 10 at Laurel, Mont., extending east and west in Montana, and which in turn connects with United States Highway No. 87 at Billings, Mont., extending north and south in Montana; and

"Whereas travel over the above-mentioned connecting highways brings much tourist travel into and out of the Yellowstone National Park over said approach road, such tourist travel will be greatly increased into and out of the Yellowstone National Park over said approach road from the north and south, as well as from the east and west, if said approach road is reconstructed and improved, and properly maintained, including snow removal therefrom; and

"Whereas said approach road greatly shortens the distances to be traveled by those desiring to travel northward or southward through the Yellowstone National Park; and

"Whereas Highway No. 12 from Red Lodge, Mont., over the Beartooth range of mountains, through historic Cooke City and on into the Yellowstone National Park is one of the most scenic routes in America; and

"Whereas because of the beauty of the scenery along said highway and recreational advantages along said highway and in said Beartooth mountains there will be a gradual increase in the use of said approach road to the Yellowstone National Park by tourists and others; and

"Whereas said highway attains an elevation of 10,924 feet over said Beartooth range of mountains; and

"Whereas it is the desire of many people that said highway be kept open for traffic and travel in winter months in order that winter sports activities may be engaged in and carried on in said Beartooth mountains; and

"Whereas the traveling public generally desires, and it is necessary to the public interests that said approach road over said Beartooth Mountains be so reconstructed, improved, and maintained, and snow removed therefrom, in order that said approach road may be an all-weather highway safe for automobile travel the year round; and

"Whereas increased use will also be made of said approach road for the transportation of petroleum and other products; and

"Whereas the Seventy-eighth Congress has enacted Public Law 521, chapter 626, second session, authorizing appropriation for the construction, reconstruction, improvement, betterment, and maintenance of said Yellowstone National Park Monument approach road: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Senate of Montana (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in regular session, hereby requests and respectfully urges the Honorable J. A. Krug, Secretary of the Department of the Interior of the United States; the Honorable Director of the National Park Service; the Honorable Director of the Public Roads Administration; the Honorable James E. Murray and the Honorable Zales N. Ecton, United States Senators from Montana; and the Honorable Wesley A. D'Ewart and the Honorable Mike Mansfield, Congressmen from Montana, to take the necessary steps in securing the necessary and proper appropriations for the construction, reconstruction, improvement, betterment, and maintenance (including snow removal) of the Yellowstone National Park Monument approach road, leading from the city of Red Lodge, Mont., to the northeast entrance of the Yellowstone National Park, which road is known as the Red Lodge-Cooke City Highway, in order that said road may be kept open and in condition for use by the traveling public at all times, such appropriations to be from the funds authorized by Public Law 521, chapter 626, of the Seventy-eighth Congress, second session; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this joint memorial be sent to each of the following: The Honorable J. A. Krug, Secretary of the Department of the Interior of the United States; the Honorable Director of the National Park Service; the Honorable Director of the Public Roads Administration, the Honorable James E. Murray and the Honorable Zales N. Ecton, United States Senators from Montana; and to the Honorable Wesley A. D'Ewart and the Honorable Mike Mansfield, Congressmen from Montana; Edmund B. Rogers, Superintendent of Yellowstone National Park; W. W. Lynch, district engineer of United States Public Roads Administration, Portland, Oreg.; L. Martin, district No. 1, Missoula, Mont.; and A. F. Winkler, chairman of the Montana State Highway Commission."

Two joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"House Joint Memorial 8

"Joint memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Montana to the Congress of the United States, the Honorable Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. J. A. Krug, Secretary of the Interior, Hon. James E. Murray and the Honorable Zales N. Ecton, United States Senators from Montana, and the Honorable Mike Mansfield and the Honorable Wesley A. D'Ewart, Representatives from Montana, for an act of Congress or such other authority as may be necessary to allow veterans of World War II, just concluded, to acquire submarginal lands from the Department of Agriculture or the Department of the Interior which have been acquired under an act of Congress dated July 22, 1937, known as chapter 517, title III, section 32 (50 Stat. 525–526)

"Whereas, under an act of Congress dated July 22, 1937, known as chapter 517, title III, section 32 (50 Stat. 525–526), the Secretary of Agriculture acquired enormous acreages of land in Montana designated as submarginal lands to develop a program of land conservation and land utilization; and

"Whereas a great amount of these tremendous acreages of land have been acquired on Indian reservations in Montana from the Secretary of the Interior of the United States; and

"Whereas it is the considered judgment of your memorializers that a great portion of the lands so acquired by the Secretary of Agriculture are not necessarily submarginal lands, but are good agricultural lands, which may be utilized for agricultural purposes in Montana to good advantage; and

"Whereas veterans of World War II, just concluded, are now returning to Montana and are unable to acquire agricultural lands in Montana, particularly those owned by the United States, under an act of Congress referred to above; and

"Whereas it would be of great advantage to the people of Montana as well as to the veterans of World War II that such veterans be afforded an opportunity of acquiring such lands in economic units: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Montana Legislative Assembly urges the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation as shall enable veterans of World War II to acquire in economic units agricultural lands owned by the United States Government, under the submarginal program referred to above, at valuations not to exceed what the United States Government has paid for such lands; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be transmitted to the Honorable Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. J. A. Krug, Secretary of the Interior, Hon. James E. Murray and the Honorable Zales N. Ecton, United States Senators from Montana, and the Honorable Mike Mansfield and the Honorable Wesley A. D'Ewart, Representatives from Montana."

"House Joint Memorial 9

"Joint memorial to the Congress of the United States urging the immediate enactment of legislation to extend the terms of the Steagall amendment to the Commodity Credit Act beyond December 31, 1948

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

"Whereas by action of the President of the United States cessation of hostilities has been proclaimed; and

"Whereas under the Steagall amendment to the Commodity Credit Act such proclamation has the effect of terminating the present parity support price program with the 1948 crop year; and

"Whereas there is still need for record-breaking production of food to aid the starving of the world and farmers of America are still being urged to produce to the limit of their capacity to aid the starving peoples of the world; and

"Whereas unless steps are taken to prevent a disastrous drop in agricultural prices such as that which occurred after World War I the farmers of America cannot with safety meet the production goals now needed; and

"Whereas the farmers of America may face disaster through a sudden and drastic farm price reduction; and

"Whereas such a drastic drop in agricultural prices which will occur unless steps are taken now to prevent it will severely penalize the farmers of America for their high production which contributed so greatly to the winning of the war: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Montana do hereby urge upon the Congress of the United States that the provisions of the Steagall amendment to the Commodity Credit Act be extended beyond December 31, 1948; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the chairman and members of the Committee on Agriculture in both the Senate and in the House of Representatives of the United States and to the members of the Montana delegation in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States and to the Honorable Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture."

By Mr. MILLIKIN:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"House Joint Memorial 4

"Whereas investigations by the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States and investigations by the Federal Bureau of Investigation have disclosed that there are, throughout the United States and within the borders of the State of Colorado, certain individuals and organizations that have as their goal and for their purpose the violent and forceful overthrow of the Governments of the United States and the State of Colorado and the destruction of the system of free enterprise which is a basic part of our National and State Governments and an element in such governments which is essential to the happiness and welfare of the citizens and residents of the United States and the State of Colorado; and

"Whereas such individuals or organizations are in many instances subservient or faithful to or connected with certain foreign governments; and

"Whereas, It is important to ascertain and insure that all employees of the United States Government are loyal to our constitutional form of Government, and, because there are apparently many Federal employees who are members of subversive groups and/or adherents to their subversive doctrines, their continued employment in the Federal Government is inimical to the best interests of the United States and the State of Colorado and the people thereof: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Sixth General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the Senate concurring herein), That the General Assembly of the State of Colorado respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to:

"1. Appropriate sufficient funds for the Federal Bureau of Investigation to continue its effective investigations and coverage of subversive organizations and individuals seeking to undermine the constitutional form of Government of the United States.

"2. Appropriate sufficient funds to the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States to enable such Committee to continue its investigations and exposure of organizations and individuals engaged in all forms of subversive activities, whether they be in the nature of communism, fascism, or nazism, and to publish periodical reports that will be of value in the educational campaign to overcome the complacency of the citizens of the United States concerning the danger of the subversive activities being carried on in our midst.

"3. Direct and authorize the investigation and removal of Federal employees who after careful investigation and careful weighing of evidence have been found to be of doubtful loyalty to our present form of constitutional Government in order that all Communists, Fascists, and their sympathizers may be removed from positions in the Federal Government where they are of potential danger and aid to the subversive forces at work seeking to undermine and overthrow the legal constitutional form of Government presently enjoyed by these United States of America; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded to each of the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Colorado, so as to urge their vigorous support in accomplishing the purposes of this memorial."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Senate Joint Memorial 5

"Joint memorial memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to extend the present Commodity Credit Corporation purchase program to cover the entire 1947 domestic wool clip, and to enact such legislation as will provide a long-range price-stabilization plan for domestic wool

"Whereas the present supply of wool within the United States greatly exceeds the stocks normally required to supply the commercial demands of the trade; and

"Whereas this surplus has been created through the cumulation of a large war stock pile and through the heavy importations of foreign wool; and

"Whereas this importation of foreign wools continues to aggravate this situation, and tends to reduce the consumption of present stock piles of wool and the current domestic clip, and causes an unstable economy within the industry; and

"Whereas a continuing policy on the part of the Department of State, extending the program of the reciprocal trade agreements, will further reduce the tariff protection given the industry by the Congress of the United States, will cause further economic hardship and hazard within the wool industry, and will facilitate the importation of foreign wools: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate of the thirty-sixth general assembly (the house of representatives concurring herein), That the Congress of the United States enact, and the President approve, such legislation as is necessary to extend the present Commodity Credit Corporation purchase plan to cover the entire 1947 domestic wool clip; and that the Congress enact, and the President approve, a long-range wool-price-stabilization program to preserve the interests of the domestic sheep-growing industry on a plane commensurate with the American standard of living; and, to effectuate such program, that there be established a wool branch within the Department of Agriculture to administer such program; and be it further

"Resolved, That the President of the United States instruct the Secretary of State to cease the present reciprocal trade-agreements program relative to the importation of wool; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Colorado in the Congress of the United States."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"Senate Joint Memorial 6

"Whereas there are now pending in the Congress of the United States various proposals designed to remedy the unfair practices resulting from the operation of the National Labor Relations Act, which deprive persons who are willing and desire to work from securing employment unless and until they have become members of labor unions; and

"Whereas the recent national coal strike afforded a vivid and striking illustration of the hardships, inconveniences, and sufferings that are caused by the closed shop and by monopolistic practices of labor unions; and

"Whereas numerous specific examples have been called to the attention of the Thirty-sixth General Assembly of the State of Colorado, where returning veterans have been denied employment even though employment was available, due to the closed shop and the arbitrary refusal of certain labor unions to permit said veterans to join said unions, which is in contravention of the rights and principles for which they fought; and

"Whereas court decisions and rulings have been handed down from time to time declaring most businesses as interstate commerce, the effect of which has brought a major percentage of labor unions under the laws enacted by the Congress of the United States and subject to the rules and regulations of the various departments of the Federal Government: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the Thirty-sixth General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the House of Representatives concurring herein), That the Senators and Representatives of the Congress of the United States from the State of Colorado are hereby urged to vote for the passage of legislation designed to remedy and correct the unfair practices resulting from the closed shop, so that no person shall be denied employment because of membership in or affiliation with, or resignation or expulsion from a labor organization or because of refusal to join or affiliate with a labor organization; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the Senators and Representatives from the State of Colorado in the Congress of the United States."

THE PUBLIC DOMAIN—IDAHO LEGISLATURE JOINT MEMORIAL

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD a joint memorial recently adopted by the Idaho Legislature on the subject of the public domain.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was received, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Joint Memorial 6

Joint memorial to the President and the Congress of the United States to preserve public lands in Idaho in their present ownership status

We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Twenty-ninth Legislature of the State of Idaho, do hereby respectfully represent that:

Whereas the Federal Government is the principal land owner in the 11 Western States and owns up to 25 percent of the land in 14 other States, and is best able to promote the conservation, development, and use of these lands in the general public interest; and

Whereas there is a persistent effort on the part of certain western Congressmen who appear to favor special interests wherein the public lands would be sold into private ownership; and

Whereas the livestock producers, farmers, sportsmen, and businessmen of eastern Idaho (users of the public lands) demand that the public lands remain in their present ownership status for the following reasons:

1. Watersheds vital to our agricultural economy would be jeopardized and reclamation development imperiled under private ownership.

2. Recreational values and privileges would be restricted, under private land ownership.

3. Hunting and fishing would be denied to the general public over large areas.

4. Livestock producers' overhead would be increased beyond the limits of economic stability. Numerous instances can be cited in which an overburden of real estate has resulted in bankruptcy.

5. Farming and livestock production are interdependent in the stability of the whole local economy. Hay and feed grains are marketed through the medium of livestock. This practice maintains soil fertility and production. Availability of feed on farms makes possible economic livestock operations on public lands.

6. Revenues collected and returned to the States by the Federal Government are now commensurate with or exceed potential tax revenues from the public lands.

7. Private ownership of the remaining public lands would result in a feudal ownership and restriction of human liberties similar to that now existent in European countries.

8. Private ownership cannot maintain adequate fire-fighting facilities and the forests are, therefore, better protected under Federal ownership.

9. It has been a common practice for private owners of land acquired at nominal cost, after removing the lumber, to permit the land to go for delinquent taxes thereby forestalling reforestation, development, and protection of the property: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Twenty-ninth Legislature of the State of Idaho (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That we respectfully urge the President and the Congress of the United States to preserve public lands in Idaho in their present ownership statute; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this joint memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the United States and to the President pro tempore of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives and of the United States Senate, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Idaho and the State of Washington with the request that they bring this matter forcibly to the attention of the Members of the Congress of the United States.

This senate joint memorial passed the senate on the 27th day of February 1947.

This senate joint memorial passed the house of representatives on the 5th day of March 1947.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 27) amending the settlement of Mexican Claims Act of 1942 to provide for the consideration of any claim decided by the General Claims Commission in which the United States filed a petition for rehearing, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 57) thereon.

REPORTS ON DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Mr. LANGER, from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Executive Papers, to which were referred for examination and recommendation two lists of records transmitted to the Senate by the Archivist of the United States that appeared to have no permanent value or historical interest, submitted reports thereon pursuant to law.

ADDITIONAL REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES — FEDERAL CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, according to monthly personnel reports submitted to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, Federal personnel, both inside and outside the United States, decreased 22,521 from the December total of 2,283,980 to the January total of 2,261,459. Excluding War and Navy Departments, there was a total decrease of exactly 999. Meanwhile, in other words, except for gradual reductions in War and Navy, the much-vaunted reduction in Federal employment is not taking place.

For that part of Federal employment within the United States, personnel decreased 10,608 from the December total of 1,987,808 to the January total of 1,977,200. The War and Navy Departments accounted for 8,122 of this decrease. Outside the United States, employment decreased 11,913 from the December total of 296,172 to the January total of 284,259. Excluding War and Navy Departments decreases, there was an increase outside the United States of 1,487.

In all, 21 agencies increased personnel during the month. Largest increases occurred in the United States Atomic Energy Commission, which added 4,098 employees; the Veterans' Administration, which added 2,978, to bring its total employment to 229,874; and the Office of Housing Expediter, a new agency, which has 1,974 employees. Other establishments which increased employment included the Interior Department, Labor Department, Civil Aeronautics Board, Federal Security Agency, Federal Trade Commission, Federal Works Agency, National Labor Relations Board, Panama Canal, Railroad Retirement Board, and Tennessee Valley Authority.

I ask unanimous consent to submit an additional report of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures relating to Federal civilian personnel and request that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was received and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDITIONAL REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES, CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, PURSUANT TO SECTION 601 OF THE REVENUE ACT OF 1941 ON FEDERAL PERSONNEL, DECEMBER 1946–JANUARY 1947

FEDERAL PERSONNEL IN THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH, JANUARY 1947, AND A COMPARISON WITH DECEMBER 1946

(All figures compiled from reports submitted by the heads of Federal establishments or their authorized representatives)

According to monthly personnel reports submitted to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, Federal personnel within the United States during January decreased 10,608 from a total of 1,987,808 in December to 1,977,200 in January. Excluding the War and Navy Departments, personnel decreased 2,486 from the December total of 1,222,630 to the January total of 1,220,144. The War Department within the continental United States decreased 7,213 from the December total of 439,223 to the January total of 432,010. The Navy Department inside the United States decreased 909 from the December figure of 325,955 to the January figure of 325,046. (See table I.)

Outside the continental United States, Federal personnel decreased 11,913 from the December total of 296,172 to the January total of 284,259. The majority of these employees are industrial workers. (See tables II and IV.) Exclusive of the War and Navy Departments, there was an increase of 1,487 from the December figure of 54,773 to the January figure of 56,260.

The consolidated table, presenting data with respect to personnel inside and outside the continental United States, shows a total decrease of 22,521 from the December total of 2,283,980 to the January total of 2,261,459. Excluding War and Navy Departments' reductions of 21,522, there was a decrease of 999 employees in the executive branch of the Federal Government from the December figure of 1,277,403 to the January figure of 1,276,404. (See table III.)

Industrial employment during the month of January decreased 14,939 from the December total of 643,087 to the January total of 628,148. The War Department decreased 13,643 outside the United States and decreased 1,187 inside the United States in the industrial group, making a total reduction of 14,830 employees. The term "industrial employees" as used by the committee refers to unskilled, semiskilled, skilled, and supervisory employees paid by the Federal Government, who are working on construction projects, such as airfields and roads and in shipyards and arsenals. It does not include regular maintenance and custodial employees. (See table IV.)

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KEM:

S. 924. A bill to credit active service in the military or naval forces of the United States in determining eligibility for and the amount of benefits from the policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CAPPER:

S. 925. A bill to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation Act, as amended, to make available to farmers through the Federal land-bank system loans similar to those made by the Land Bank Commissioner on behalf of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation; to transfer the existing Land Bank Commissioner loan and related assets of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation to the Federal land banks; to provide for the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation to repay its Government capital with interest; to authorize the Federal land banks to establish a Federal land-bank system reserve fund; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(Mr. MURRAY (for himself, Mr. WHERRY, and Mr. TOBEY) introduced Senate bill 926, to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. YOUNG:

S. 927. A bill to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act approved July 16, 1916, and acts amendatory thereto and supplementary thereto; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. BYRD:

S. 928. A bill to place Edwin H. Brainard on the retired list of the Marine Corps; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. GURNEY:

S. 929. A bill to amend section 2 of the act prescribing regulations for the Soldiers' Home located at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. 564); to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. BALDWIN (by request):

S. 930. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to reclassify the salaries of postmasters, officers, and employees of the postal service; to establish uniform procedures for computing compensation; and for other purposes," approved July 6, 1945; to the Committee on Civil Service.

By Mr. TAFT:

S. 931. A bill to extend certain powers of the President under title III of the Second War Powers Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. KILGORE introduced Senate bill 932, to provide for the retirement of any holder of the Medal of Honor with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain in the Army or Marine Corps, or of a lieutenant, senior grade in the Navy or Coast Guard, and to provide for the award of adequate pensions to the widow and minor children of any such holder, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. O'CONOR:

S. J. Res. 90. Joint resolution to establish a commission to study intergovernmental fiscal relationships; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

AMENDMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION ACT

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], and myself, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bill intended to make explicit the powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation respecting American small and independent business.

Some confusion has arisen because of a decision of the Comptroller General concerning the power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to use its funds in behalf of small business.

Section 18 (e) and (f) of Public Law 457, Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, which is the Surplus Property Act of 1944, expressly provided that the then existing Smaller War Plants Corporation "shall have the power to purchase any surplus property for resale to small business when in its judgment such disposition is required to preserve and strengthen the competitive position of small business." The Smaller War Plants Corporation "is hereby authorized, for the purpose of carrying out the objectives of this section, to make or guarantee loans to small business enterprises in connection with the acquisition, conversion, and operation of plants and facilities which have been determined to be surplus property, and, in cooperation with the disposal agencies, to arrange for sales of surplus property to small business concerns on credit or time bases."

When the Smaller War Plants Corporation was discontinued by Executive order of the President, we were given absolute assurance that its functions in behalf of small business would be carried on fully and vigorously by the Department of Commerce and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The loan functions of the Smaller War Plants Corporation were transferred by Executive order to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Since that time RFC has made valiant efforts to meet the loan needs of small businesses seeking to acquire war surplus plants and equipment. When powers of the RFC to do this work have been called into question the whole program in behalf of independent small business is placed in jeopardy. This is an emergency situation. It was so recognized by the House of Representatives Committee, which acted favorably upon a companion bill, H. R. 2535, reporting it to the floor on last Friday.

Mr. President, I am sure that the Members of this Senate are aware of the vigorous and sustained efforts of the Senate Small Business Committee in behalf of independent and small business over the past 6 years. It was largely due to our efforts that the Smaller War Plants Corporation was set up during the war, which made possible a great contribution to the war effort by small business throughout the Nation. Not only were thousands of small businesses kept alive and functioning during the war years, but largely through such efforts as ours were they able to carry on when the war was over. But even despite all of this, over half a million independent businesses closed their doors during the war. Many of these, and many more new businesses, are now struggling to make their way in the postwar world. The billions of dollars of plant and equipment built and purchased at the taxpayers' expense should be used to the fullest extent possible to enable these small new businesses to gain a foothold, for it is through the survival and growing strength of these businesses that our American system of free enterprise expresses itself so well.

This is what we of Congress had in mind, I am sure, when we passed the Surplus Property Act. This is why we have put specific provisions in the act providing for loans to small business and for the intercession of a Government agency in behalf of small business so that these businesses could in their reconversion efforts acquire Government property. I am sure that the merits of the bill I have just introduced will appeal to all Members of the Senate and that speedy action will be taken so as to make sure that American small business is given its full opportunity to survive and expand.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 926) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, introduced by Mr. MURRAY (for himself, Mr. WHERRY, and Mr. TOBEY), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

BENEFITS FOR HOLDERS OF MEDAL OF HONOR

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, in many, if not in most, of the nations members of their armed forces who, in war, achieved the highest decorations for gallantry have been recognized by being retired, or by receiving pensions or grants of some kind. We in this country have conferred the Congressional Medal of Honor, our highest honor, on a very few people, but on too many occasions some of these people have found themselves eventually in need. Most of them have been wounded before acquiring a medal.

For that reason, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce for appropriate reference a bill which would automatically, in the case of enlisted men and officers in the Army below the grade of captain, and below the grade, in the Navy, of lieutenant senior grade, give to them that commission and retire them as retired officers of the Army or the Navy, as the case may be.

These benefits also would be awarded to widows and minor children of veterans who have been awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor. I deeply believe that this action should have been taken a long time ago. The cost, Mr. President, would be negligible, and in many cases it would prevent gallant heroes or their widows and children from being forced to accept assistance from their families or public institutions in times of need.

Mr. President, this is the least we can do for the gallant men who did so much for our country.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 932) to provide for the retirement of any holder of the Medal of Honor with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain in the Army or Marine Corps, or of a lieutenant, senior grade, in the Navy or Coast Guard, and to provide for the award of adequate pensions to the widow and minor children of any such holder, introduced by Mr. KILGORE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

THAD E. RAGSDALE

Mr. MURRAY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 94), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Thad E. Ragsdale, the sum of $1,046.67, for reporting and transcribing certain hearings held by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor during the second session of the Seventy-ninth Congress.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES—AMENDMENT

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed and lie on the table an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH], to the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts, to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes. I believe there is on the desk a substitute offered by those Senators, as well as the substitute offered by the committee. The amendment I desire to propose is to the substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island.

There being no objection, the amendment was received, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

CREATION OR CHARTERING OF CERTAIN CORPORATIONS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. McGRATH submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 503) to establish and effectuate a policy with respect to the creation or chartering of certain corporations by act of Congress, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles, and referred, as indicated:

H. R. 193. An act to amend section 35 of the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437; 30 U. S. C., sec. 191), as amended;

H. R. 197. An act to transfer part of block 14 and the school building thereon of Petersburg town site, Alaska, used for school purposes, to the town of Petersburg, Alaska;

[Mr. PEPPER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address entitled "Monopoly and the South," delivered by Wendell Berge, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, before the Southern Economic Association, Birmingham, Ala., November 22, 1945, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE THREAT OF COMMUNISM

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Missouri has been interrupted, I wonder whether he will yield to me for 3 or 4 minutes, to permit me to read a poem into the RECORD.

Mr. DONNELL. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, the poem I am about to read is in the nature of an editorial written by Mr. James G. Stahlman, in the Nashville Banner, of Nashville, Tenn. I think it is very timely, and I think Senators will approve of it:

FROM THE SHOULDER

(By James G. Stahlman)

Uncle Sam is squinting
Down his gun sights
At World War III.
Now don't jump
Out of your seat
Or down my throat.
It's as plain as day.
That's what Harry Truman
Told Congress and the world
In his message
On the proposed loans
To Greece and Turkey.

He didn't say it
As openly and bluntly
As I have here,
But any sap knows
What Harry Truman meant
When he went all out
In a last desperate gamble
To hold onto America's chips
In the fastest poker game
Since God created man.

America now finds herself
In a death struggle
With communism.
It's been on the way
For a long, long time,
But a lot of pinks
And punks and pukes
Tried to fool you
Into believing
That Freedom's Eagle
And Communism's Bear
Could become bunk-mates.

I've hammered this typewriter
Until my fingers became sore—
I've talked before civic clubs,
Fraternal organizations,
Church groups
And others
Until my tonsil wounds bled
And my larynx failed—
All in an effort
To arouse you
And you
And you
To a realization
That communism
Was on a world rampage
That would not stop
Short of its goal
Unless free peoples everywhere
Were ready to stand up and call it to halt.

I saw communism
Sweeping lands
From the English Channel
To the China Sea.
I was hopeful that England
Would remain free
To assist us
In the struggle ahead.
I still have hopes,
But England's strength
Is already sapped
By insidious forces
Bent upon destruction
Of free government
Under the guise of socialism.
It is possible
That England may not be able
To survive internally.
If that happens,
It's us on our own.
There's no other choice.

We are now the victims
Of international deviltry
That smirked behind
The false whiskers
Of cooperation
With an alleged ally.
Appeasement payday
Has arrived.
Payment of the bill
Isn't going to be easy.
It will be definitely costly.

It will take millions of dollars,
Perhaps millions of lives
To atone for
The betrayal of Mihailovich
To Communist Tito;
The sell-out of exiled Poles
To the Lublin gang;
The surrender of the veto
To crafty Uncle Joe;
The despicable game
Of political chess
Where hopeless,
Helpless Jewish pawns
Are played gleefully
Against Arab aspirations;
The gift of strategic isles,
Our western front door,
To Communist Russia,
In an outrageous trade
For her less-than-a-week
Participation in the war Against Japan.

Yes, payday is here!
And with a vengeance.
Cairo,
Teheran
And Yalta
Must be paid for.
The recklessness
Of the Roosevelts,
The fanaticism
Of the Wallaces,
Browders,
Lilienthals,
Peppers,
The gutless,
Spineless policies
Foisted on America
In the name of idealism,
Democracy,
Cooperation with an ally
And kindred claptrap
Now come home to roost.

The shibboleths
And battle slogans,
Of two world wars,
Fought "to make democracy safe"
Turn out to be
Just a lot of tripe.
The billions of dollars
And millions of lives
Expended in those two efforts
Must now be backed up
By more billions of dollars,
Perhaps more millions of lives,
In order to preserve
Our way of life.
Communism
Must be stopped
Within her own boundaries.
It must be rooted out here.

If the future
Of free peoples in Europe
Is so precious to us,
Why be so unconcerned
About what happens here?
If it's good to stop
Communism at its back door,
It is still better
To get it out
Of our own cellar.

And while we're dumping
Four hundred millions
Into the hopper
To stave off disaster
In Greece and Turkey,
We had better cut off
All loans, gifts,
Advances, or whatever you call them,
To any and all nations
That do not subscribe
To our kind of democracy.
It's time for all nations
To stand up
And be counted!
Either they're with us
Or against us.
Now is the best time
To find that out.

I'm not in favor
Of helping anybody
Harboring national ideals
Inimical to our own.
We sent scrap iron to the Japs
Until they threw it back at us.
Let's not finance
Any government
Or bolster with our dollars
Or our commitments
Any outfit espousing
Communism
Or any other ism
Except Americanism.
We're fools, if we do.

Let's put democratic dollars
To work for democratic ideals.
(Small "d", please)
And let's back those dollars
We are sending abroad
To stop communism's inroads
On western Europe
By spending other dollars here
In weeding out
All Communists
In the United States.

Their allegiance
Is to Russia, not us.
Their goal is overthrow
Of our government.
They have been,
Still are,
And always will be,
A menace to freedom,
To democratic ideals,
To the worship of God,
To America's way of life.
The chips are down.
This is not penny ante.
The sky is the limit
And the game is for keeps.
Let's play 'em close,
And be ready
To crock the first guy
Who reaches for a gun.
We'd better win this hand.
It's the last we'll ever hold.

Mr. President, I very earnestly bring this wonderful editorial, in the form of a poem, to the attention of the Members of the United States Senate and of the people of the United States. It is time we were being serious about the menace of communism in the United States.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYEES FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to defined and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the committee amendment. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] has the floor.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, at the outset today I call attention to the following clipping from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of March 15, 1947:

MOUNT CLEMENS PORTAL SUIT AGAIN APPEALED

DETROIT, MICH., March 14.—The Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case, pattern for nearly $6,000,000,000 in portal-to-portal pay claims, was appealed to a higher court again today.

Counsel for the pottery workers asked a hearing in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals at Cincinnati, Ohio, first step in any appeal to the Supreme Court.

Frank A. Picard, United States district judge here, dismissed the Mount Clemens suit last month, ruling that the employees were not entitled to portal pay.

Mr. President, at the conclusion of the session yesterday we were considering part I of House bill 2157, as amended, and now before the Senate.

It had been suggested by the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] that it would be advisable to insert in the RECORD the citations of certain additional authorities bearing upon the weight which is given by the Supreme Court of the United States to findings of fact and policy in congressional action. At this point in my remarks I call attention, therefore, to the case of American Power & Light Co. against Securities and Exchange Commission; also Electric Power & Light Corp., petitioner, against Securities and Exchange Commission, the opinion in which combined cases, on writs of certiorari, was handed down November 25, 1946. The decision is also reported in Sixty-seventh Supreme Court Reporter, page 133. The citation to which I specifically refer is set forth at page 142. The language to which attention is particularly directed is this:

They—

Referring to certain standards—

derive much meaningful content from the purpose of the act, its factual background and the statutory context in which they appear. See Inter-Mountain Rate cases (234 U. S. 476, 34 S. Ct. 986, 58 L. ed. 1408). From these sources—from the manifold evils revealed by the legislative investigations, the express recital of evils in paragraph 1 (b) of the act, the general policy declarations of Congress in paragraph 1 (c), the standards for new security issues set forth in paragraph 7 * * * a veritable code of rules reveals itself for the Commission to follow in giving effect to the standards of paragraph 11 (b) (2).

I call attention also to the case of North American Co. against Securities and Exchange Commission, reported in Sixty-six Supreme Court Reporter, page 793, at which point the Court refers to certain portions of the provisions in the policy which is set forth in subdivision 1 (c) of the act known as the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935.

I call attention particularly to the fact that at page 794 the Court likewise referred to the contents of certain findings in subdivision 1 of the same act, and that at page 795 of the same division attention is directed to the contents of paragraph 1 (c) of the same act.

I call attention to the fact that in the course of the language at page 794 the Court says:

Congress has found that all of these various abuses and evils occur and are spread and perpetuated through the mails and the channels of interstate commerce. And Congress has further found that such interstate activities, which grow out of the ownership of securities of operating companies, have caused public utility holding companies to be "affected with a national public interest."

Citing paragraph 1, subdivision (a) of the act.

I call attention to certain footnotes of the Court, in which specific reference is made to the congressional findings as to abuses listed in paragraph 1 (b) of the act. I call attention also to the citation of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, Forty-ninth Statute 803, Fifteenth United States Code annotated, paragraphs 79 and following.

These are to be added to the authority of the John L. Lewis case, to which reference was made yesterday.

I am quite aware of the fact that, as indicated in the case of United States v. Carolene Products Co. (304 U. S. 152), it is not possible for the Congress, merely by recitals, to remove from unconstitutionality an act which is unconstitutional; but I undertake to say, Mr. President, that clearly when Congress makes recitals of facts from which the Congress itself draws the conclusion that a substantial interference with interstate commerce results from those facts, the authorities clearly indicate that the Supreme Court will give great weight to the findings so made by the legislative body in the course of the legislation.

Yesterday, I had reached the latter part of page 9 of the bill. Beginning in line 17, we find the following language:

The Congress further finds that the varying and extended periods of time for which, under the laws of the several States, potential retroactive liability may be imposed upon employers, has given and will give rise to great difficulties in the sound and orderly conduct of business and industry.

At this point in my remarks, I ask unanimous consent that there be incorporated therein table H, together with the notes appended thereto, appearing at page 50 of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary submitted on March 10, 1947, namely, Report No. 48.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Period reduced since 1938.

[2] 6 months' statute of limitations held unconstitutional as applied to bar a suit for overtime pay and damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act by Oregon Supreme Court (Fullerton v. Lamm et al., Nov. 20, 1945, 8 WHR 1175). Decision upheld by Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals (Clarke Lumber Co. v. Kurth, Dec. 6, 1945, 8 WHR 1214).

[3] State statute for 1-year period of limitation on filing of actions for wages claimed under Federal statute or regulation declared unconstitutional by Federal District Court of the Western District of South Carolina (Davis et al. v. Rockton & Rion Railroad, Mar. 29, 1946, 9 WHR 343).

[4] Washington Supreme Court states that action under act is not governed by 3-year Washington statute of limitations applying to actions upon contract or actions upon statute for penalty or forfeiture, since such action is not based on liability created by contract and overtime compensation and liquidated damages are not a penalty. Action under act to recover overtime compensation, liquidated damages, and attorney's fees is based on liability created by statute since, in the absence of statute, there would be no obligation upon employer to pay such amounts. Therefore, suit is governed by 2-year "catch-all" statute governing actions not otherwise provided (Cannon v. Miller et al., Jan. 26, 1945, 8 WHR 216).

[5] Mississippi 1-year statute of limitations for "all actions and suits for any penalty or forfeiture on any penal statute" held applicable to claim under act for liquidated damages for failure to pay overtime and other wages by the Mississippi Supreme Court, such damages being in the nature of a punishment without reference to the damage sustained by the employees by reason of delay in payment (Southern Package Corp. v. Wilson, June 6, 1944, 7 WHR 658).

Mr. DONNELL. The table is a summary of State statutes of limitation believed applicable to suits under section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Continuing under the heading "Findings and policy," the bill further recites:

The Congress further finds that all of the foregoing constitutes a substantial burden on commerce and a substantial obstruction to the free flow of goods in commerce, contrary to the purposes of said act.

The Congress, therefore, further finds and declares that it is in the national public interest and for the general welfare, essential to national defense, and necessary to aid, protect, and foster commerce, that said act be amended as hereinafter set forth.

It will be recalled that the act to which reference is made is the Fair Labor Standards Act. It will also be recalled that in that act itself, section 2 contains as its first paragraph the finding by Congress that the existence in industries engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce of labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for the health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers constitutes, among other things, an unfair method of competition in commerce, leads to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce, and interferes with the orderly and fair marketing of goods in commerce.

Attention is further called to the fact that subdivision (b) of section 2 of the Fair Labor Standards Act declares it to be the policy of that act, through the exercise by Congress of its power to regulate commerce among the several States, to correct and, as rapidly as practicable, to eliminate the conditions set forth in section 2 in such industries, without substantially curtailing employment or earning power.

The findings and policies set forth in part I of the pending bill further continue as follows:

The Congress further finds and declares that all of the results which have arisen or may arise under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, as aforesaid, may (except as to liability for attorney's fees and, in the case of the Bacon-Davis Act, for liquidated damages) arise with respect to the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts and that it is, therefore, in the national public interest and for the general welfare, essential to national defense, and necessary to aid, protect, and foster commerce, that said Walsh-Healey Act and said Bacon-Davis Act be amended, as hereinafter set forth.

With this language part I of the bill concludes.

Part II of the bill relates to existing claims, and is so entitled.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Is this an appropriate time to ask the Senator questions with reference to the bill, or would the Senator prefer that I wait?

Mr. DONNELL. I think this is a good time to ask questions about the part of the bill which has been discussed. If the Senator's questions relate to later portions of the bill, I ask, with the consent of the Senator, that he defer his questions until we arrive at those portions of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. The difficulty is that a committee of which I am a member meets this afternoon, so I shall not be able to be present and hear all the Senator's speech.

Mr. DONNELL. Under those circumstances, I shall certainly yield to the Senator for his inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask a question relating to section 2 (a), page 11, starting with line 25, which reads:

> Nor shall any provision of any such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any such portal-to-portal activities.

It seems to me that the purpose is to prevent payment of portal-to-portal pay whether or not it has been freely agreed by both parties that such compensation should be paid. If my understanding is not correct I should like to know what is the purpose of that provision.

Mr. DONNELL. I do not think the Senator's understanding is correct. I shall state the purpose of the provision to which he has referred. It will be recalled that the Fair Labor Standards Act does not define "work" or "work time." It will be recalled that the decision of the Supreme Court in the Mount Clemens case takes up certain specific activities, notably the walking from the entrance to the place of work, and various preliminary activities which are enumerated by the Court, and declares such walking and preliminary activities to be compensable. The purpose of the language to which the Senator refers is illustrated by the following: Had we omitted this language, together with the earlier portion of the language in the same paragraph, which earlier portion reads as follows:

> For the purpose of this section no judicial or administrative interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities (as defined in sec. 5)—

I say, had we omitted the language of that entire paragraph beginning at line 19 on page 11 and continuing through line 3 on page 12, it would be easily possible for a claimant, when confronted by the requirement that in order to make compensable his activities he must show, either an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract, or a custom or practice, to make the contention that the very use of the word "work" in the contract, or a synonym of the word "work", would incorporate by reference the decision in the Mount Clemens case, and even though there were no express provision in the contract entitling him in so many words to compensation for walking time or other preliminary activities, he would be entitled thereto.

Let me illustrate. Suppose a plaintiff should come into court, the law having been enacted exactly as it is in the pending bill, eliminating the language from line 19 on page 11 to line 3 on page 12; suppose he had a contract of employment which said nothing whatsoever as to whether he should or should not be entitled to walking time and preliminary activity time. He introduces that contract into evidence and rests his case. The court looks at the contract and says, "There is nothing in this contract which expressly provides that you shall be entitled to compensation for walking time and for other preliminary activities." "But," says the plaintiff immediately, "Your Honor has overlooked the fact that there is in this contract either the word 'work' or a synonym of 'work'; and that under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Mount Clemens case such activities as I am claiming for come under the definition of work, or the time involved therein under the definition of working time."

The court might very well conclude, unless there were such a provision as I have indicated, beginning in line 19 on page 11, that the contract was an express provision for compensation for such activities. Therefore we have inserted, after considerable thought and effort devoted to phrasing the bill, a distinct provision that no judicial or administrative interpretation shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and the employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities which are declared to be noncompensable.

We now come to the language to which the distinguished Senator refers, which is as follows:

> Nor shall any provision of any such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any such portal-to-portal activities.

Mr. President, if the latter clause were not in the bill it would mean that a man could come into court with a contract which simply said, "There is hereby incorporated the Mount Clemens case," or "the decisions and interpretations of the Fair Labor Standards Department."

Such language of course would be so vague and indeterminate as to lead to all kinds of litigation and doubt as to its meaning. He could then assert that by reason of the incorporation of those words into his contract such activities as walking and other preliminary activities had been made compensable.

I regard the language from line 19 on page 11 to line 3 on page 12 as exceedingly important. In order that a person may be entitled to recover he must have an express provision saying affirmatively that he is entitled to compensation for such activities. He may not rely upon some vague generality which, in order to determine its legal meaning, might require the services of counsel searching not only the Mount Clemens decision, but every other decision of the Supreme Court, searching not only the current utterances of the bureau having in charge the administration of the Fair Labor Standards Act, but also thousands upon thousands of previous rulings of that bureau. I regard this as being of great importance to the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire, either, to make a lot of work for lawyers.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, let me say that this bill is very seriously drawn, and there is no purpose to work either for or against lawyers. The bill is drawn with the design to wipe out portal-to-portal cases and to make the law as clear as it is humanly possible to make it, so that if a man is to be entitled to compensation, he cannot rely on a vague generalization, but must rely on an express provision stating in so many words that he is entitled to the compensation for which he seeks to recover.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLANDERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The point I am trying to make is that if both sides freely agree to a vague generality, what business does anyone else have to stop them?

Mr. DONNELL. I think the very fact of the existence of this great mass of litigation is a conclusive answer to that question. More persons than the employer and the employee are interested in a labor contract; public interest is also involved. I undertake to say in this instance that it is of the greatest importance that an express provision of a contract shall actually be an express provision, not vague, general, incorporating by reference that which lawyers or courts might debate interminably. I say, further, that if any employee or a labor union representing an employee has entered into an agreement with an employer to the effect that walking time and preliminary activities shall be compensable, certainly there is no great difficulty in saying it in so many words in the English language, rather than by using some controversial, vague method of general expression which seeks to multiply litigation, rather than to minimize it.

Mr. LODGE. Then, I understand it to be the Senator's contention that if both parties desire to provide for portal-to-portal pay, they can provide for it directly, in specific terms.

Mr. DONNELL. Exactly.

Mr. LODGE. That is the particular part of my question which I had in mind.

Mr. DONNELL. If there is any other part of the Senator's question which he thinks I have not yet answered, I should like to answer it now.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have the privilege of propounding one more question.

Mr. DONNELL. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. In section 5, under "Definition," on page 14, the definition therein stated seems to a layman like myself to require some clarification. It seems to me that the definition is not at all explicit. Why not include at least a general definition of the phrase in section 5, which is a portion of part II which pertains to existing claims. The bill does not undertake to give a definition until much later, and in this section portal-to-portal activities are simply defined as meaning portal-to-portal activities.

Mr. DONNELL. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Massachusetts has incorrectly read the section. It reads as follows:

> SEC. 5. Definition: As used in this part, the term "portal-to-portal activities" means those activities which section 2 hereof provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act.

If the Senator from Massachusetts will revert to section 2, he will find from that section that the activities which are therein provided as ones which shall not be a basis of liability or punishment are all activities of an employee except those which were compensable by either an express provision of a written or unwritten contract or by a custom or practice in effect at the time of such activity, as amplified in lines 12 to 18 of section 2.

Mr. LODGE. That is a definition of what portal-to-portal is not. It is not a definition of what portal-to-portal is. When we read section 5 we find that it refers the reader to section 2; and in line 25 of section 2 the reader is referred once more to section 5. The result is that a layman never gets an idea of what a portal-to-portal activity is, but simply gets an idea of what it is not.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I think it is perfectly clear. If the Senator will read the language with care, he cannot mistake the meaning.

Mr. LODGE. I have done that.

Mr. DONNELL. It is perfectly clear; there can be no question as to its meaning. Portal-to-portal activities are defined as those which section 2 provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment. Those activities are specifically defined under section 2 of the act, as I have indicated.

Mr. LODGE. I am obliged to the Senator for his answer, and I thank him.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. Is it not true that the bill states that portal-to-portal activities do not come under the term "work" unless the parties specifically understand and agree that they are to come under that term?

Mr. DONNELL. Either by contract or custom or practice.

Mr. HAWKES. Yes; either by contract or custom or the habits of the community that are familiar to the people.

Mr. DONNELL. No, Mr. President; I would not say "the habits of the community"; but the custom in the particular place of business or particular establishment or other place where the employee is employed.

Mr. HAWKES. That is exactly what I meant. Probably I misspoke myself.

To give an illustration, am I not correct in understanding that the Senator is saying that the parties can agree to anything which they wish to agree to as being "work"?

Mr. DONNELL. Certainly.

Mr. HAWKES. In other words, they can agree either verbally or in writing that everything an employee does from the time he gets out of bed in the morning and performs his ablutions until he gets home at night will be regarded as work, so long as they expressly provide so in the contract and know it must be paid for as work.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator is precisely correct.

Mr. HAWKES. And in that way, by knowing what is to be paid for, it will be possible for a business to be conducted satisfactorily because it knows in advance what must be paid for. On the other hand, if the manager of a business does not know what is understood in that connection by either party, it will be impossible for him or anyone else to continue to operate the business under such conditions.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator from New Jersey has stated the matter so clearly that there can be no misunderstanding.

Mr. President, we were discussing part II of the bill. I may say, as previously indicated, that part II relates to existing claims. The purpose of part II is to deal solely with claims which exist at the time of the enactment of the pending measure.

The Senate will observe in due time that the approach which we make in the bill is quite different in the case of existing claims as contradistinguished from claims arising in the future. I want it distinctly understood that until I arrive at part III, unless there shall be some interruption which causes me to project myself into that part of the bill, I am dealing solely with existing claims.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HAWKES] has so clearly analyzed, in a very few words, the ultimate effect of part II. that it is scarcely necessary for me to do more than to say that part II proceeds upon the theory, and legislates into effect the theory, that no employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under any one of the three acts which we have been discussing, namely, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act, on account of the failure of the employer to pay an employee minimum wages, or to pay an employee overtime compensation, for or on account of any activities at any time during the 24 hours of a day which were engaged in prior to the date of the enactment of the pending measure, except such activities as were compensable, first, by an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activities, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative, and his employer; or second, a custom or practice in effect, at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee was employed, covering such activity, not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract, in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer.

If any labor union desires to make compensable any activities, as the Senator from New Jersey says, from the moment a man gets out of his bed, or any other time, and if the employer and a labor union, or the employer and employee, shall agree that all such activities outside the regular workday shall be paid for, they are required to be paid for, and are not exempted from the obligation to be paid for by this section.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. If I may, I should like to inject into the Senator's statement, which seems to me to be very clear, the assertion that, unless he knows what his obligations are, no one can operate a business. In the absence of such knowledge I defy anyone on earth to tell me that he can conduct a business, maintain it, and keep it functioning for the benefit of the employees, the owners, and the general public. The very heart of the successful conduct of a business is knowledge of what one's obligations are, and success cannot follow if a multitude of imaginary items may be brought forward at a late hour, when the owner or manager of a business thinks he is solvent, only to find, if he is legally bound under the newly suggested obligations, that he is insolvent and out of business. That is not the United States of America.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the Senator has again very clearly stated the situation. I come back now to the Mount Clemens case, and in this decision, which surprised the Government of the United States, employers, employees, and the public, the Court said, referring to walking work:

> Work of that character must be included in the statutory workweek and compensated accordingly, regardless of contrary custom or contract.

In other words, Mr. President, the ultimate effect which we are seeking to accomplish by the proposed act is to provide that instead of employees being entitled to be compensated for something in the past that was contrary to custom or contract, as they are permitted under this decision of the Supreme Court, to the surprise and consternation of the Nation, we are going back to the principle which the Senator from New Jersey expresses, namely, that an employer and employee may enter into a contract about anything they desire, make it definite and certain, and both be bound by it. That is simply hard common sense, and that is what part II of this bill will accomplish.

Mr. President, I mentioned yesterday that there will undoubtedly be litigation over this bill if it shall be enacted; we have no question of that, of course. We realize it will be contended in the Supreme Court of the United States that, inasmuch as the bill will operate to wipe out the great bulk, as we believe, of portal-to-portal suits based upon activities which were not compensable either by custom or by contract, Congress has violated the fifth amendment by depriving the employees of their property without due process of law. I explained very fully yesterday the theory of our committee. I read excerpts from the decisions of the Supreme Court, the language of which seems to me clearly to answer that contention; but we have realized, as must any person, that discretion is the better part of valor, and that it is advisable in this legislation to provide against the eventuality that the courts may take a position contrary to that which Congress takes as to the validity of the first portion of part II. I want again to make it perfectly clear, Mr. President, that in the opinion of the committee which has presented this bill to the Senate the language of the Supreme Court in the Norman case, in the L. & N. case, and its action in the National Carloading case, the expression by

Mr. Justice Murphy himself, in the case from which I read, decided on November 25, 1946, all establish clearly the fact that the Court, if it follows the decisions to which reference has been made, should, and will, sustain the validity of the first portion; that is to say, section 2 of part II of this bill.

But, Mr. President, in order that we may cover the situation which would arise in event the Court should hold section 2 to be invalid, or if the Court should hold it to be void, for uncertainty or for any other reason, thus leaving valid and enforceable claims, the "surprise claims," of men and women under the Fair Labor Standards Act, we have provided against that eventuality by the provisions of section 4 of the bill. Section 4 is entitled "special separability provisions," and it reads as follows:

If, notwithstanding the provisions of section 2 hereof—

I digress to remind the Senate that section 2 is the one to which I have addressed myself, and which provides that no employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under the acts referred to, because of any activities on the part of an employee, unless such activities were compensable either by contract or custom. Section 4 provides:

If, notwithstanding the provisions of section 2 hereof, any claim for pay for minimum wages, or for overtime compensation, based on portal-to-portal activities, for any reason remains valid and enforceable after the date of enactment of this act then with respect to each such claim and with respect to any action pending on or commenced after such date on such claim, the following contents of this section shall apply:

(a) There shall be no recovery of any amount as liquidated damages.

I pause at that point in the reading, Mr. President. It will be recalled that under section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act, not only is an employer who employs a man who works overtime liable for time-and-a-half, but, if he shall fail to pay overtime, he is liable in an additional equal amount as liquidated damages. Under the language of the pending bill there will be no recovery of any amount as liquidated damages for any of the activities to which reference is made in section 4. Congress, in our judgment, has the right to strike down this statutory privilege of liquidated damages. This portion of section 4 accomplishes that purpose.

In the second place, Mr. President, section 4 proceeds as follows:

(b) No court shall require the defendant to pay the whole or any part of the attorney's fee of the plaintiff.

It is provided, as will be recalled, in section 16 (b) that the court in any action mentioned in that section shall, in addition to any judgment awarded to the plaintiff or plaintiffs, allow a reasonable attorney's fee to be paid by the defendant, and costs of the action. This portion of section 4 of our bill takes away that statutory gift, which is presented to the plaintiffs in suits under the provision of section 16 (b).

In the third place, Mr. President, it will be recalled, and I say this at the expense even of possible prolixity, because I want no misunderstanding, section 4 applies only in the event that the claims under section 2 shall be held to be valid and enforceable, notwithstanding that they are made invalid and unenforceable by section 2.

Section 4 proceeds, in subdivision (c), as follows:

The claimant shall be required with respect to any such claim to bear the burden of proof, which shall include proving the extent of his claim, without the benefit of inference, and under no circumstances shall there be shifted to the employer the burden to come forward with evidence of the amount of activities claimed by the employee to have been engaged in. If the employee fails to carry such burden of proof, then the court shall award judgment to the employer.

The occasion for that subdivision of section 4 is this: The Mount Clemens decision, as was pointed out last Friday, contains among other things the following statement:

The burden then shifts to the employer to come forward with evidence of the precise amount of work performed, or with evidence to negative the reasonableness of the inference to be drawn from the employee's evidence. If the employer fails to produce such evidence, the court may then award damages to the employee, even though the result be only approximate.

Mr. President, this portion of the decision, as I indicated Friday, arises because of the fact that the court presented the view that it is obligatory upon the employer to maintain records showing all the facts in regard to his employees—character of their work, when they worked, and the time they worked. But, with all due deference to the court, I submit most respectfully that when an employer has neither a contract nor a custom under which his employee was to be entitled to compensation for walking time, it is not fair or just to require the employer to keep records upon such a maze of details as would be necessary in order to keep track of how far each employee walked, or how long it took each employee to tape his arms, or raise the window, or grease his arms, or don his overalls, or whatever the case might be.

In the event the early portion of part II, section 2, should not be declared valid, we believe that it is proper to shift the burden of proof back to the plaintiff as is the case almost without exception in the jurisprudence of our country, except in some unusual circumstances, notably, in fiduciary cases.

We, therefore, have inserted in the bill the provision which I have read from section 4, which places back on the employee the burden of proof, which rested upon him all the time prior to the rendition of the opinion in the Mount Clemens case.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to point out that there is nothing in the provision just discussed which would prevent an employee from securing from the employer by proper methods any records which were in the possession of the employer.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct. I am glad the Senator made that interpolation. If the employer has records, of course, the employee has the full benefit of every statutory provision entitling him to their production.

Mr. President, it will be recalled that on yesterday, mention was made of the fact that in the case of the Brooklyn Savings Bank against O'Neil the Supreme Court of the United States indicated and decided that settlement and compromises cannot be made, that is to say clearly that is true where there are disputed facts in existence. We feel, however, that in the case of these surprise liabilities, liabilities which industry did not expect, which neither management nor employees expected, it is entirely proper and is conducive to disposing of such cases with expedition and dispatch that there should be the power to make settlements, compromises, and releases or satisfaction of claims. Thus it is that the bill in section 4, applicable as I have indicated only in the event section 2 shall not have been held valid and enforceable, provides as follows:

(d) Settlement, compromise, release, or satisfaction of such claim before the date of enactment of this act shall be a defense thereto and any other appropriate legal or equitable defense may be pleaded in defense of such claim.

Mr. President, I want to call attention in that subsection to the words "equitable defense." It may well be that an employer would have a right to plead estoppel against an employee who has for years worked and accepted his pay week after week, and never raised his voice to utter the statement that he was entitled to compensation for surprise activities of the portal-to-portal type. So we have put in the specific language that "any other appropriate legal or equitable defense may be pleaded in defense of such claim."

It will be observed that this subsection of section 4 relates to settlements, compromises, releases, or satisfactions which shall have been made before the date of enactment of this legislation.

Then subsection (e) provides:

Such claim may be hereafter settled, compromised, release, or satisfied—

That is to say in the future—

But only if such settlement, compromise, release, or satisfaction contains a provision that the amount of money, if any, resulting therefrom be distributed equitably among the real parties in interest to such claim.

I think it is a very wholesome provision which constitutes the latter part of that subsection as well, of course, as the entire subdivision.

The reason why it is provided that the satisfaction or release, and so forth, must contain "a provision that the amount of money, if any, resulting therefrom" shall "be distributed equitably among the real parties in interest to such claim," or rather that there shall be a provision in the release to that effect, arose from the fact that we desired to be certain that the money paid in satisfaction of a claim shall go to the individuals who are entitled to it rather than to a nominal plaintiff who sues on behalf of himself and perhaps thousands of others, and then, when the settlement may have been effected, may be able to say, "Now we need money for some other purpose in our labor union," for illustration, "and instead of turning this money over to you employees there is a certain assessment made against it." Consequently, we inserted this provision with respect to future settlements and compromises, which is only to be made use of in the event the instrument of settlement, compromise, release, or satisfaction contains a provision that the amount of money, if any, resulting therefrom shall be distributed equitably among the real parties in interest to such claim.

Mr. President, I have already, in answer to the question of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], read, I think, section 5, containing the definition of portal-to-portal activities. I have omitted section 3, which appears in part II, which section 3, in my judgment, is really unnecessary, but it is a wise precaution, I think, to put it in, because we say in that section 3 that:

The provisions of section 2 of this act shall not be deemed to release or extinguish or to apply to any penalty or liability incurred under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act prior to the date of enactment of this act which is based upon activities other than portal-to-portal activities.

In other words, Mr. President, the provisions of section 2 do not release or extinguish the penalties or liabilities based upon compensable activities.

Mr. President, I have analyzed part II of the act, which relates, as I have indicated, to existing claims. I now come to part III, which relates to future claims. Here, as I have indicated, we have approached the subject matter from quite a different angle. We have taken the position under part II that in the first place we should extinguish, cancel, annul, and make unenforcible the collection of moneys in portal-to-portal suits. I should have mentioned, by the way, two other subsections in section 2, which I overlooked. They are subsections (b) and (c), which read as follows:

(b) Each claim based on any portal-to-portal activities is hereby declared to be and is null and void and unenforceable.

(c) No court shall have jurisdiction of any action for minimum wages, overtime compensation, or liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act, whether instituted prior to, on, or after the date of enactment of this act, to the extent that such action seeks to enforce any liability with respect to any claim based on portal-to-portal activities.

Those two subsections are, I think, self-explanatory.

I was about to proceed to part III, which relates to future claims, that is to say, which governs employees in their relations with the employers after the enactment of this legislation. It determines what activities are compensable and what are not.

Mr. President, here we have come to the conclusion that we do not legislate as to the entire 24-hour period, for if we do it may well be, and in fact will be, that we shall have legislated out of existence some claims which may bring about an injustice to the plaintiffs therein.

In part II we have legislated for the entire 24-hour period, for the reason indicated by me in my argument of yesterday or possibly on Friday. We have done it because of the fact that if we did not legislate with respect to the entire 24 hours it was our judgment that we would leave still pending, still undetermined, still a threat to American business and to the economy of our Nation and to the Government itself a great multitude of suits which it was our desire to extinguish. So I pointed out the other day that in part II of our bill we made the legislation applicable to the 24-hour period, and made every activity therein performed uncompensable—that is to say, under the three acts which have been mentioned—unless they were compensable by either contract or custom.

Now when we come to the future there is quite a different picture. Here we realize that it is important that the employees and the employers may, so far as possible, be free from the possibility of injustice throughout the regular workingday period, the time from the whistle in the morning to the time of the whistle in the afternoon. Therefore we are not undertaking to legislate in part III as to the workday proper; but we are legislating solely with respect to the preliminary activities, before the beginning of the workday, and the postliminary activities, after the conclusion of the workday, the two classes of claims with respect to which this vast uncertainty has arisen in our economy. We provide, first, an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, the amendment to consist of a new section reading as follows:

PORTAL-TO-PORTAL CLAIMS BANNED

SEC. 7A. No employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under this act on account of the failure of such employer to pay an employee minimum wages, or to pay an employee overtime compensation, for or on account of any of the following activities, hereinafter termed portal-to-portal activities, of such employee engaged in, on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947:

(a) walking, riding, or traveling to and from the actual place of performance of the principal activity or activities which such employee is employed to perform, and

(b) activities which were preliminary to or postliminary to said principal activity or activities, which occur either prior to the time on any particular workday at which such employee commences, or subsequent to the time on any particular workday at which he ceases, such principal activity or activities.

Up to that point, if we were to stop there, we would be legislating that the walking, riding, and traveling therein described are the preliminary or postliminary activities which are noncompensable, that is to say, those which occur either prior to the time on the workday at which the employee commences or subsequent to the time on the workday when he ceases his principal activity or activities. But we have added a proviso, reading as follows:

Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any of the foregoing portal to-portal activities of such employee which is compensable by either—

(1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer; or

(2) a custom or practice in effect, at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee is employed, covering such activity, not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract, in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent or collective bargaining representative and his employer.

Further, we say:

For the purposes of this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities; nor shall any provision of any such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any such portal-to-portal activities.

So as we look forward into the future an employee finds, first, that his activities in walking, riding, or traveling to and from the actual place of the performance of his principal activity—for instance, walking to the lathe which he operates, the walking taking place from the door of the plant up to the lathe—are not compensable. The employee is not entitled to compensation for any of those processes of walking, riding, or traveling, unless he has an express provision of a written or unwritten contract to that effect, or can show a custom or a practice in effect at the time of such activity at the place where he is employed, not inconsistent with the written or unwritten contract by which he is entitled to compensation.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. That seems very clear; and to me it means that in the future pay for work will be from the time the employee reaches his place of employment and starts his work until he finishes it, unless there is a custom or an agreement between employer and employee providing for different treatment. I can give an illustration of such a custom. Some plants have their time clocks at the front gate, which may be half a mile from the place of work, and the employees check in at the gate. If that custom has been in effect, this provision does not say that it may not continue.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct. In other words, if it is the custom to pay for walking time from the time clock to the place of work, that time will be compensated for.

Mr. HAWKES. What the Senator is saying is that the employer knows that that part of the expense is in the picture.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

Mr. HAWKES. There is nothing new about it.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

Mr. HAWKES. There is nothing that the employer fails to understand about that being a part of his expense in operating the business if it is the established custom or covered by agreement between the parties.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

Mr. HAWKES. What the Senator is saying is that the employee will be paid from the time he gets to work until he finishes work. There is nothing in the bill which provides that the employee may not say to his employer, "I am not satisfied with the present arrangement. I want to be paid from the time I enter the plant gate, or from the time I park my automobile down the street, half a mile from the plant." If they agree that he shall be paid from the time he parks his automobile on the way to work, while at work, and while going back to his automobile, that is perfectly legal and legitimate, because it is a known expense of business.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

Mr. HAWKES. I wanted to be sure I understood the Senator, because I think the proposal is very clear.

Mr. DONNELL. That is exactly correct. It is also true that part III, which relates to future claims, does not legislate at all with respect to the period of the workday proper, as generally understood in common parlance. Let the quadrilateral formed by the Speaker's stand before me represent the workday. The proposed legislation does not apply to that. It does apply to the time spent in walking or traveling up to that point, or after leaving that point. It applies to both those activities, and provides that no person shall be entitled to compensation for any activity before he reaches the place where he performs his principal activity or after he leaves his principal activity, unless he can show either a contract or a custom or practice entitling him to compensation for such activities.

Mr. HAWKES. I wish to reemphasize a point I have emphasized before, for to me it is the most important element in the whole picture. What the bill undertakes to do is provide a clear definition of what expense and liability rest on the employer, so that he may know in advance how to conduct his business and what his expense of operation is likely to be.

Mr. DONNELL. That is exactly correct.

I proceed now to section 7. I need not read it in detail. It bears the same relation to the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts as section 6 bears to the Fair Labor Standards Act. The same observations apply, and substantially the same provisions are set forth.

Up to this point the bill has three parts. The first part deals with findings of policy. The second part is the proposed law applicable to existing claims at the time the bill goes into effect, the purpose being to extinguish such claims. If it shall prove that our action in attempting to extinguish them in toto be invalid, we undertake to extinguish them to the utmost of our legal power to do so. Part III, as I have indicated, relates to the future. I have described it to the best of my ability, and it has been well commented upon by the Senator from New Jersey.

We now proceed to the final portion of the bill, part IV. Section 8 contains a provision entitled "Representative Actions Banned." Let me say just a word about what is meant by representative actions. It will be recalled that in section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act there is a provision reading as follows:

> Action to recover such liability—

That is, the liability for unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation, and liquidated damages—

> Action to recover such liability may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction by any one or more employees for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other employees similarly situated.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that two types of action are permitted under this sentence in section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938: First, a suit by one or more employees, for himself and all other employees similarly situated. That I shall call for the purpose of identification a collective action, a suit brought by one collectively for himself and others. The second class of actions authorized by that sentence embrace those in which an agent or a representative who may not be an employee of the company at all can be designated by the employee or employees to maintain an action on behalf of all employees similarly situated.

In illustration of this latter category—which category for purposes of identification I call a representative action, as distinguished from a collective action—suppose that every one here present this afternoon were employed by the X steel company, and we all belonged to a labor union, and gave a power of attorney to the district director of the labor union who might live 500 miles away and not be employed at all in the plant in which we were employed. He could file a suit there as a representative of all of us. We would not be in that case at all except as he was our representative. It will be noted, therefore, Mr. President, that in those two classes of cases there is this difference: In the first case, an employee, a man who is working for the X steel company, can sue for himself and other employees. We see no objection to that. But the second class of cases, namely, cases in which an outsider, perhaps someone who is desirous of stirring up litigation without being an employee at all, is permitted to be the plaintiff in the case, may result in very decidedly unwholesome champertous situations which we think should not be permitted under the law.

So section 8 amends the Fair Labor Standards Act by eliminating that portion of section 16 (b) which permits employees to designate an agent or representative to maintain an action for and in behalf of all employees similarly situated.

Then, Mr. President, subdivision (a) does something else, which I can illustrate in this way: Suppose that today, in the absence of subdivision (a) of section 8, John Smith files a suit on behalf of himself and all other employees of the United States Steel Corporation. Then 3 years from now, after the statute of limitations in that particular State shall have run against any employees, let us say, we find, however, that some of the employees come forward—3 years later—and say, "Now, we will ratify what this man did in filing suit for us 3 years ago, and although we would be barred by limitation if we filed our suit ourselves at the time we now come into court, nevertheless, since he instituted the suit for us 3 years ago, we now join in that suit."

In the first place, Mr. President, the employees, in the case which I have cited, have had no obligation during the entire period. They have not been bound to enter into the litigation. They have made the election, in the case I have indicated, after the time when they would be barred from maintaining the suit.

We have provided in the pending bill that—> such action shall be deemed to have been commenced as to any individual claimant as of the date when such claimant is named in such action as a party thereto.

So it will not be possible for 10,000 men to wait 3 years, with the employers not knowing how many thousands of dollars or millions of dollars, perhaps, of claims will be asserted against them, and then come forward—3 years later—after they would normally have been barred by limitation, and insist upon recovery. If the statute of limitations shall have run against any given individual, under the bill as we have drawn it, and if he fails to file suit before the statute shall have operated against him, he will be barred.

The final sentence in section 8 (a) reads as follows:

> No employee shall be made a party plaintiff to any such action unless he gives his consent in writing to become such a party and such consent is filed in the court in which such action is brought.

Obviously, Mr. President, this is a wholesome provision, for it is certainly unwholesome to allow an individual to come into court alleging that he is suing on behalf of 10,000 persons and actually not have a solitary person behind him, and then later on have 10,000 men join in the suit, which was not brought in good faith, was not brought by a party in interest, and was not brought with the actual consent or agency of the individuals for whom an ostensible plaintiff filed the suit.

So we have provided, as I say, that no employee shall be made a party plaintiff to any such action unless he gives his consent in writing and unless such consent is filed in the court in which the action is brought.

Certainly there is no injustice in that, for if a man wants to join in the suit, why should he not give his consent in writing, and why should not that consent be filed in court?

Mr. President, subdivision (b) likewise provides:

> The amendment made by subsection (a) of this section shall be applicable with respect to any claim accruing under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, on or after the date of enactment of this act.

We now proceed to section 9, which relates to limitations. I introduced into the RECORD earlier today a tabulation showing the situation with respect to limitations in our country. In the first place, there is no Federal statute of limitations applicable to the Fair Labor Standards Act. There are individual statutes of limitations in the various States of the Union. As indicated in the table which was filed today, the periods of limitation in the various States differ as to the number of years, varying from 1 year to as many as 6 years, I believe, which latter figure is provided for in several States. I indicated yesterday, in my presentation, that not only does the Fair Labor Standards Administrator—or the gentleman who was until a few days ago the Administrator, Mr. Walling—favor a Federal statute of limitations, but a very clear exposition of the desirability of such a uniform statute was placed in our record by Mr. Abt, counsel for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers organization.

Mr. President, we believe that the reasons for a uniform statute of limitations are clear. In the administration of a Federal law which applies all over the United States, no difference should exist with respect to the time within which a plaintiff may file suit under that law. There is no reason why in Vermont, the State from which comes the present Presiding Officer [Mr. FLANDERS in the chair], an employee should have 6 years, whereas in North Dakota, from which comes my friend on my right [Mr. GURNEY] an employee should have only 1 year. I gave other illustrations yesterday. I mentioned Iowa, with 2 years; Illinois, with 5 years; Minnesota, with 2 years; Wisconsin, with 6 years; Massachusetts, with 6 years; and North Carolina and South Carolina, competitors in textile industries, with 3 years and 1 year respectively. Obviously a textile manufacturer, for illustration, who is engaged in business in Massachusetts, where an employee can lie back for 5 years and 364 days before he files his suit, is in a less advantageous position than is an employer in South Carolina, where only 1 year may elapse from the time of the accrual of a claim before an employee must file his suit in order that the suit may be valid.

So, Mr. President, a uniform statute of limitations is of importance. There may be room for discussion as to the number of years of the limitation. Mr. Walling, then Administrator of the Fair Labor Standards Act, who testified before us, as I recall favored 3 years. There was testimony by Mr. Pressman, of the CIO, favoring, as I recall, a period from 3 years to 6 years, and there was testimony of other persons as to various periods of time. The Gwynne bill, which was passed by the House of Representatives by an overwhelming majority, provides for a period of 1 year. We have attempted to work out, to the best of our ability, what we think is a fair period of time; namely, 2 years. Of course, it is an arbitrary period. One man may think it should have been 1 year, and another man think it should have been 3 years or 5 years or 6 years.

At this point, Mr. President, I offer for the RECORD and ask consent to have incorporated as a part of my remarks, a memorandum prepared under date of February 28, 1947, by Margaret Fennell, of the Federal Law Section of the Library of Congress. The memorandum is entitled "Limitations of Actions in Civil Cases as Fixed by Provisions of Federal Laws."

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIMITATIONS OF ACTIONS IN CIVIL CASES AS FIXED BY PROVISIONS OF FEDERAL LAWS

Sixty days: Petitions to set aside Federal Trade Commission's orders to cease and desist (52 Stat. 112 (c), 117, sec. 5).

Sixty days: Petitions to set aside orders of Secretary of Agriculture as to interstate commerce in new drugs (52 Stat. 1053 (h)).

Ninety days: Actions in war-contract excess-profits cases (58 Stat. 86–87 (e)).

Six months: Suits by aggrieved party in war contract repricing (58 Stat. 92, sec. 801 (c)).

Six months: Admiralty suits against fund for compensation for requisitioned, etc., vessels (57 Stat. 48, sec. 3 (a), 49 (d)).

One year: On bonds of public contractors, for labor or material furnished (49 Stat. 794, sec. 2 (b)).

One year: Against carriers of goods by sea (49 Stat. 1209, sec. 3 (6)).

One year: Against carriers by water in certain cases (54 Stat. 941, sec. 308 (f) (3)).

One year: Against Federal Crop insurance Corporation (53 Stat. 919, sec. 3).

Two years: On usurious transactions by credit unions (60 Stat. 744, sec. 1; Public Law 574, 79th Cong.).

Two years: Suits for refunds, etc., on potato sales (49 Stat. 788, sec. 215).

Two years: Admiralty suits, under act of March 9, 1920 (47 Stat. 420, ch. 315).

Three years: On judgments liquidating debts due United States (36 Stat. 1142, sec. 180).

Three years: Under Employees' Liability Act of April 22, 1908 (53 Stat. 1404, sec. 2).

Five years: Against sureties on official bonds (25 Stat. 387, sec. 2).

Five years: For penalties and forfeitures under customs laws (49 Stat. 527, sec. 306).

Six years: for recovery of premiums paid to purchasers of public lands (R. S. 2376).

Six years: Suits for infringement of patents (60 Stat. 778; Public Law 587, 79th Cong.).

Six years: on marshals' bonds (R. S. 786).

Six years: against false claimants from United States (R. S. 3494).

No limit on claims for overtime, etc., submitted in accordance with Act of July 31, 1946 (60 Stat. 747, sec. 3 (c); Public Law 575, 79th Cong.).

MARGARET FENNELL,
Federal Law Section.

FEBRUARY 28, 1947.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator will recall that last year the Committee on Education and Labor by majority vote also reached the conclusion that a 2-year statute of limitation would be fair and reasonable, and so recommended to the Senate.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator for recalling that fact to my mind.

So, Mr. President, we have phrased subdivision (c) (1) which is to be subdivision (c) (1) of the Fair Labor Standards Act, as follows:

(c) (1) Every claim under this act for unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation, or an additional amount as liquidated damages, accruing prior to or on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, shall be forever barred unless, within 2 years after such claim accrued, suit to enforce such claim is commenced in a court of competent jurisdiction.

We are confronted by this situation: Here is a man who asserts a claim, under the decision in the Mount Clemens case, let us say. Suppose the Court should determine section 2 of our bill to be invalid. I refer to the section which kills portal-to-portal suits. Then the man in question comes forward to file his suit, and is confronted by the provision of the bill, which I have read, establishing a 2-year bar; and he finds himself barred because his claim had accrued more than 2 years before he undertook to assert it. It is our judgment that if the provision of our bill with respect to cancellation and nullification of the portal-to-portal suits were held invalid on the ground of unconstitutionality, it would likewise be true that the statute of limitations which undertakes to whittle down the time within which the holder of one of these claims may file his suit would likewise be unconstitutional, unless a reasonable time be provided within which the claimant may yet file his suit after the passage of this proposed act. So, bearing that fact in mind, we have incorporated in the bill subdivision (2) of section (c), which will become a new subdivision of the Fair Labor Standards Act. It reads as follows:

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, suit to enforce any such claim accruing prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 may be commenced within 120 days after such date if such claim is not barred at the time of commencing suit by any other statute of limitations; and the period of limitation provided for in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not be applicable to any suit so commenced.

To illustrate, Mr. President, let us say a man in Virginia, where the period of limitation is 3 years, comes forward with a suit, immediately after the pending bill has been enacted, and undertakes to file his suit, and finds that more than 2 years have elapsed since his claim accrued. Let us say that he reads subsection (1) of section (c) at the top of page 19 of our bill, and determines that, "I am barred." But then he goes further and finds that inasmuch as the State of Virginia has allowed him 3 years, consequently if he comes in within 120 days after the pending bill goes into effect, he can sue on his claim and the suit will go back as far as 3 years; namely, the statutory period under the law of Virginia. We think these provisions of the limitation section are just and proper.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to address to the distinguished Senator, whose scholarly discussion of this whole subject has, I think, been very fine, one or two questions, if I may do so, with reference to the subject of the statute of limitations.

Mr. DONNELL. I am very happy to have the Senator from Florida do so.

Mr. HOLLAND. As a predicate for my question, I should like to remind the distinguished Senator that my State is one of seven which have a State statute of limitations of 1 year.

I understand from the Senator's discussion that 2 years was regarded as a fitting average time; but I am wondering whether there would be any unwillingness on the part of the Senator to allow the continuance in force, in those States where there is a 1-year statute of limitations, of the effect of their State statute.

Before the Senator answers the question, let me say that I think the record shows that the efforts of the States which have relied upon a 1-year statute of limitations have been satisfactory, in that the only four States in which no portal-to-portal suits have been instituted are four of the seven States in which there is a 1-year statute of limitations. In other words, it seems to have brought about a peaceful situation, rather than the contrary; and I may say that in my State if there was any objection whatever coming from labor leaders to the enactment of that statute, it never came to my attention and has not yet come to my attenion.

So my question is whether there is any unwillingness on the part of the distinguished Senator or on the part of his committee to allow to those States which, through the deliberate expression of their legislatures, have gone to a 1-year statute of limitations, the right to have that statute continue in effect in those particular States?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, in answering the question of the Senator from Florida, who has served with such distinction as Governor of his own State, I will say that in the judgment of our subcommittee—and I may interpolate that I do not recall that the subject was discussed in the Judiciary Committee itself—it would not be desirable to follow the suggestion of the distinguished Senator. The reason why we so believe is that it would still leave a lack of uniformity, it would still leave the condition that in some 41 States of the Union the period of limitation would be 2 years, and in 7 States, I believe it is, the period of limitation would be 1 year. It would mean that in the case of an industry which had companies operating in a State with a 1-year statute, and other companies operating in a State with a 2-year statute, namely, the Federal statute, the companies operating under the 1-year State statute would have a competitive advantage over those operating under the 2-year statute, namely, the Federal statute of liability.

I may say that I have great confidence in and deference for the opinion of the distinguished Senator, and I have no doubt that the Senate will be just and proper in its decision with respect to any suggestion he may make to it on that subject. But, so far as our subcommittee is concerned, and therefore speaking as one who is acting as the floor proponent of the bill, I respectfully decline to consent to incorporate in the bill a provision retaining the 1-year statute in the States which now have it.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. May I ask him another question on the same subject?

Mr. DONNELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have no desire at all to suggest anything that would work any destructive effect on the bill. I am for a measure which will bring to an end the present confusion. At the same time, I do not desire to bring about that result at the expense of sacrificing a device which has shown its usefulness in my State, and in other States.

I have no doubt of the constitutionality of an amendment which would save the 1-year statute in those States which have enacted it. I have consulted with the legislative counsel, and I find that they are of the same opinion. I wonder if the distinguished Senator has given any thought to the constitutional aspect of the matter, because, as I said in the beginning, I do not want to work any destructive effect upon the bill, but I do desire to incorporate by amendment the provision I have suggested, if to do so would not harm the bill.

Mr. DONNELL. Certainly I personally have not given thought to the constitutional question involved. I do not know whether either of the other two appointed members of the subcommittee or the ex officio member has given it thought. I am sure that we shall be very happy, during the course of the debate and in the interim which will elapse before the bill shall be voted upon, to consider the question, and to advise the Senator as to our conclusion with respect thereto.

I may repeat, however, that our subcommittee is not willing, and, acting as the floor proponent of the bill, I decline, to accept the amendment. That of course does not preclude the able Senator from presenting it to the Senate, and I am sure that he will present it fairly and capably, and if the Senate shall adopt it, I am sure it will have acted in line with what it thinks is the wise course of procedure.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DONNELL. I wish also to say a word in appreciation to the Senator for his very encouraging and kindly reference to our bill. I do not wish to put more into his mouth than he has said. There may be imperfections in our bill. We have tried to make it as good as possible, and I am sure I appreciate, and I know my colleagues do, the confidence of the Senator from Florida, and his very kindly expressions.

Mr. President, our bill proceeds, in subdivision 3 of the amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act, which amendment is incorporated in section 9 of the bill, with this language:

> Any such claim, if based on portal-to-portal activities as defined in section 5 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, and any suit thereon, shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947.

I can well appreciate the point made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as to the difficulty of anyone jumping from place to place in the bill—and in many other bills, for that matter—and at first glance grasping the full meaning. But I think the meaning here is clear, namely, that any claim mentioned in the proposed amendment of the Fair Labor Standards Act set forth in section 9 of our bill shall have been based on activities which under section 5 of the bill are not compensable, and any suit thereon shall be subject to the provisions of section 4, which provisions, generally speaking, are those which say that there shall be no recovery of any amount of liquidated damages, no award of attorneys' fees to be paid by defendants to plaintiffs, placing the burden of proof on the plaintiff, making possible future settlements and compromises, and the validation of previous settlements and compromises.

Mr. President, I proceed now with the further provisions of section 9 of the bill which, in substance, referring to the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act, provide similar provisions as to a 2-year statute of limitations under each of those acts, providing likewise for a 120-day period similar to what is provided in subdivision (2) of subsection (c), set forth on page 19 of our bill.

Likewise, Mr. President, on page 20 there is a provision that—

> Any such claim—

That is to say, any claim under either the Walsh-Healey or the Bacon-Davis Act—

> Any such claim, if based on portal-to-portal activities as defined in section 5 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, and any suit thereon, shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947.

Just as in the case of claims based on portal-to-portal activities under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

I come next to section 10 of the bill. That section is entitled "Reliance on Administrative Rulings." Let me respectfully call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that I am approaching this subject. We provide in the bill that the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end of section 16 a new subsection to read as follows:

> (d) Neither liability nor punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of this act—

I interpolate that the liability and the punishment under those two sections are the criminal liabilities referred to in section 16 (a)—

> (d) Neither liability nor punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of this act, nor liability for an additional amount as liquidated damages under section 16 (b) of this act, shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice of the Administrator, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice, after such act or omission, is amended or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect.

Immediately following what I have just read as an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act is a similar provision as to liability for an additional amount as liquidated or other damages under the Walsh-Healey Act.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that the language of both the provision in this section 10 relating to the Fair Labor Standards Act, and the portion of section 10 relating to the Walsh-Healey Act, refer solely to the future, that is to say, as to any act done or omitted in good faith on or after the date of the enactment of the pending bill, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, and so on. No liability as described in the section shall be predicated thereon.

The occasion for these provisions relative to administrative rulings may be illustrated in this way: Let us take the case of an employer in Nebraska, who writes to the Administrator under the Fair Labor Standards Act and says, "I am operating a laundry," and gives the facts with regard to its operation. He inquires, "Am I or am I not subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act?" The Administrator replies, saying, "You are not subject to the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act." Whereupon, the employer goes ahead on that theory and employs his workers we will say for 43 hours a week, instead of 40 hours a week; and then, within the period of limitation of Nebraska, which is 4 years, either these employees find out from legal counsel that the Administrator was wrong, or perhaps the Administrator changed his view and advised the public that he was wrong. In the meantime, the employer has spent his money and fixed the prices of his product on the basis of the earlier ruling of the Administrator.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Carrying the illustration further, the laundry proprietor did not find that the Administrator had changed the order, until it was determined by the Administrator that the laundryman was doing more than 25 percent of his business with hotels and restaurants. The Administrator then issued the new order that the laundry was engaged in interstate commerce, because it was doing the laundry work of persons engaged in interstate comerce. The Administrator, therefore, changed his order. That is where the difficulty arose. The new order classified the laundry as being engaged in interstate commerce, because 25 percent or more of its business was with hotels and restaurants that served traveling men who were engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator for amplifying my remarks. The illustration which he has given very clearly places before the Senate a situation in which obviously an injustice appears to have been done; for if, after the employer has relied upon the ruling of the very man who is in charge of the administration of the act, it be discovered years later that the Administrator was wrong, or he himself changes his opinion, and the employer is then subjected to liability, it would appear that it would be unjust to subject him to that liability.

Of course, I realize there are two sides to this question. The other side of it may be somewhat illustrated in this way: In the first place, the Administrator has no legal power to issue any binding interpretations of the Fair Labor Standards Act. He has authority to issue certain administrative orders and rulings, of one type or another, but when it comes to telling the laundryman whether he is or is not under the act, the Administrator has no power. Of course, from the standpoint of the laundryman, the latter will say, "Well, to whom can I go, if not the Administrator?" Indeed, the laundryman may point out that the Supreme Court of the United States has, on at least one occasion, possibly more, mentioned that interpretations by the Administrator of the Fair Labor Standards Act should be given careful consideration and reliance; yet, of course, on the other hand, as I say, the Administrator has no legal power to issue these regulations and make them binding. The Supreme Court itself, notably in the Holly Hill case, involving area of production, held, at least in that case, and I think it is true of others, that certain interpretations issued by the Administrator were wrong.

Mr. President, in order to bring this down to a small focus, we finally came to the conclusion after very considerable study—and I may say it is not an easy proposition; a very good debate can be made on both sides of this question—we finally determined, I may say, not in our subcommittee, as I remember it, but in the Committee on the Judiciary itself, as a whole, to put these provisions into the act, on the general theory that where a man goes to an authority, such as the Fair Labor Standards Administrator, the only authority to which he can go, and the Administrator issues a ruling, even though it be not binding, the man ought not to be subject either to criminal liability or to liquidated damages, in the event he has relied upon the ruling of the Administrator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the Senator that, where an individual in good faith relies upon a ruling of the administrator, he should not be subject to criminal or civil action thereafter.

Mr. DONNELL. Pardon me. The Senator, I think, means criminal liability or civil liability for liquidated damages.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct; that is what I am talking about. But in reading paragraph 2 of section 18, I am wondering if the committee has not gone far astray from what the Senator has been talking about. In other words, all that is necessary to be done is to rely on "any administrative regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice."

I ask the Senator this question: The committee bill permits an employer to escape criminal liability and civil liability so far as liquidated damages is concerned, if he can show he acted in good faith in accordance with or in reliance upon any "regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice of the administrator." The words "or practice" are very vague, and I would like to ask the Senator, when does a man act in good faith in reliance on a practice?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I answer the Senator by saying that his mind and the minds of our subcommittee are running along the same line. I may say that yesterday we ourselves prepared an amendment—I do not have a copy of it before me at the moment, but I shall have it—the effect of which is to limit the rulings to regulations, orders, interpretations, or rulings, in writings of the administrator, and I do not want the words "in writing" to refer solely to the last word, "ruling." I mean a regulation in writing, an order in writing, an interpretation in writing, or a ruling in writing.

Mr. LUCAS. I think the Senator's suggestion has much merit. It seems to me that before an individual can act in good faith upon a question of this kind, the ruling or order or regulation should be written. In other words, he ought to have something before him upon which he can base his action. If he undertakes to base it upon what some official in Washington, some subordinate, said at a meeting, or if he seeks to base it upon some loose practice which may prevail, it strikes me that interminable difficulty and trouble would be encountered in the practical application of the act.

I merely raise that question for what it is worth, and I am glad to see that the Senator is thinking along the same line and will probably offer an amendment in due course; not, perhaps, to strike out, but to make it definite, sure, and certain that when an individual is acting, he is acting on a written order or regulation, or something that comes from the Administrator in writing. When he does that, there certainly can be no question about it.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator. With the permission of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], I should like to recite something of the conferences which have been held over the telephone between him and myself; Senator COOPER being present when they were held.

The Senator from Nebraska called me on the telephone, the latter part of the week, I think it was—Friday—and suggested to me that he would like very much, because of the fact that small business is greatly interested in this matter, to have this clause relative to reliance on administrative rulings be made applicable in the past, instead of solely to the future, by inserting the words "prior to" in line 2 of page 21.

In addition to that he had in mind the desirability, in his judgment, of allowing an individual to be exempt from liability of a criminal nature or for liquidated damages in the event he had relied upon the ruling of some other board or body. I first thought the Senator meant the War Department, but I found out later that he had reference to the War Labor Board, and possibly some other board, but of that I am not sure. At any rate we held conferences over the telephone on this matter, and in the course of our conferences the Senator himself suggested the importance of inserting, as I recall, a provision entitling a person to rely only on written provisions.

I may say, Mr. President, that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and I had in the meantime, curiously enough, arrived at the same general proposition. The Senator from Kentucky and I ourselves drew an amendment to paragraph (d) of subsection (1) applying the Fair Labor Standards Act, on page 20 of the bill, and to subsection (2) on page 21 applying to the Walsh-Healey Act, and we furnished a copy of the amendment to the Senator from Nebraska who, although he was desirous of having the amendment refer to rulings of persons other than the administrator, has offered the amendment on the floor for the consideration of the Senate. Now whether or not the Senator desires to stand on it in the exact wording as he offered it, I do not know, but if I may complete this statement, the applicable part of his amendment is "in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling of the administrator, in writing."

And a similar provision in the language applying to the Walsh-Healey Act. I observe that the Senator from Nebraska is on his feet and I should like very much to have him amplify what I have stated, and if I have made any errors, will he kindly correct them.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I endorse in toto the explanation given by the distinguished Senator from Missouri. I do feel that, instead of simply having the provision apply to the Administrator, it should apply to any administrative agency which issues an order in writing. I had reference to the War Labor Board. In a number of instances the Wage and Hour Administrator has overriden other administrative agencies in applying and imposing his rulings after a person had acted in good faith under other rulings. But we are willing to accept the amendment which has been offered to us, by the distinguished Senator, and to which we finally agreed. Last night, because we had not reached the point of discussion the amendment I asked that the amendment be printed, and I offered it in my own name, but in reality it is the amendment which was prepared by the subcommittee and which the subcommittee referred to me. It represents a compromise with my amendment, and I agreed to accept it, and they agreed to accept the language if I would offer the amendment. So I offered the amendment. If Senators are interested in it they can find the amendment on their desks.

I still think that relief should be extended to individuals who have relied upon rulings of any administrative agency, but I certainly agree that the subcommittee did its best to give the small businessmen the relief they are asking for only in good-faith cases. I think those that are acting in bad faith should be penalized under the liquidated damages section.

The distinguished Senator mentioned the case of a laundryman who was penalized. He explained that situation fully. I believe that the laundry proprietor should obtain relief under the good-faith clause from any damages arising under any circumstances, when he had operated for nearly 3 years under the written order of an administrator, who then changed his mind and assessed damages against the laundryman because his second order was contrary to his first order. In that case the laundryman relied in good faith upon the first order of the administrator made in writing, and I think he has a defense against the suit which is brought against him in view of the fact that he acted in good faith and complied with the first order issued by the administrator.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Nebraska. I want to call to his attention, so that there will not be any possible misunderstanding, to the fact that the only exemption from liability or punishment that is granted even by the amendment which the Senator has submitted is from criminal liability or liability for liquidated damages.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand that.

Mr. DONNELL. In other words, if a man were employed in a laundry and the employer was assured that the laundry was not under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and then thereafter for 3 years the employees were employed for 43 hours a week, namely, 3 hours overtime, the employer would not be relieved from the obligation to pay time and a half for the 3 hours overtime. The only thing the employer would be freed from would be from the liability for another time and a half in the form of liquidated damages. He would be freed also in other cases that I have indicated, from the criminal liability under sections 15 and 16 (a).

Mr. President, as to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska that reliance might be had on something other than regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling of the Administrator, our subcommittee was unable to agree with him, for this reason: We feel that the only person upon whose rulings the public could rely under the Fair Labor Standards Act is the man who is administering the act. We did not think if someone in the War Labor Board or other administrative agency should issue a ruling that might refer to the Fair Labor Standards Act that you, Mr. President, or I should be entitled to rely upon such ruling of the person in the other department. Therefore, we were not willing to go any further than our original bill did insofar as the person whose ruling, order, and so forth, should be relied upon, namely, the administrator under the particular act.

Mr. President, we have, however, acceded to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska to make these provisions applicable not only to acts done after the date of the enactment of this measure, but also to those done prior to the date of the enactment of the measure.

We are in full agreement with the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the subcommittee, have the right to accept the amendment which he has described as my amendment, and which I have offered, without the amendment being put to a vote? In other words, can the Senator modify the committee amendment at this point to include my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment may be offered at any time.

Mr. WHERRY. I mean can the committee amendment be modified by the chairman of the subcommittee without the amendment being put to a vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there be action by the committee, the Senator from Missouri cannot accept the amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to inquire of the distinguished Senator, Is the acceptance of the amendment, of which the Senator spoke, action on the part of the full committee, or only action on the part of the subcommittee?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, we have not taken the matter up with the full Committee on the Judiciary. We shall be very happy to do so, however, before the final vote is taken.

Mr. WHERRY. If the Senator will take the matter up with the full committee I shall appreciate it very much. If the full committee accepts my amendment it will eliminate the necessity for action upon the amendment on the floor.

Mr. DONNELL. I assure the Senator that the majority of the subcommittee—we have not had an opportunity to confer with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND]—will recommend the adoption of the amendment and the approval of it by the full Judiciary Committee.

Mr. President, I now come to section 11 of the bill, which is merely a series of definitions. I think it is probably unnecessary to read that section unless some Senator wants it read. It defines the terms "person," "commerce," "employer," "employee," and "wage" under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

It defines the term "employer," when used in this act in relation to the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act.

Then, Mr. President, section 12 is the customary separability clause that—

> If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of this act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Finally, Mr. President, section 13 provides that—

> This act may be cited as the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947.

An appropriate amendment to the title is also set forth at the end of the bill.

Mr. President, I complete at this point, and I know it is of great relief to the Members of the Senate, this very lengthy presentation of the bill, and I want to assure the Senate that it has been a very great privilege to the members of our subcommittee to have had the bill before us. I think it has likewise been a great privilege to the Committee on the Judiciary itself. It has been a privilege to have had the opportunity to work on the bill and giving it our best efforts.

With these remarks I conclude my statement.

THE ROAD TO PEACE

Mr. TYDINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McFARLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair). The Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] is absent by leave of the Senate because of illness in his family.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] is absent because of the death of a relative.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are detained on public business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, on Wednesday last the Members of the Senate and the House assembled in the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear the President of the United States deliver a very earnest and serious message. I do not know what thoughts ran through the minds of others who listened to that address, but I do know that in my mind and in the minds of many others who assembled in the House of Representatives the question arose, "Why is not the United Nations undertaking this work?" There was proposed a unilateral action by the richest and most powerful Nation in the world. It was proposed to go to the aid of two unfortunate nations. I was thinking of the United Nations, which has been set up to establish a body of international law and to maintain peace, order, and justice in the world. It was a matter of regret to me that we had not made more progress so that this agency, the United Nations, might have undertaken the work to which the President addressed himself.

Of course, in fairness, it must be said that the United Nations is very young, little more than 2 years old, and it is too much to expect that it should become a lusty organization in the form of world affairs so quickly. As I thought of the numerous debates which had taken place here, particularly with reference to the atomic bomb and the control of atomic energy, I was greatly disappointed that we had not been able to go forward more rapidly to carry out the aims, ideals, and purposes for which the United Nations had been created. I wondered what could be done which would anticipate a recurrence of what happened on the 11th of January when the President addressed the Congress. I wondered what we could do, as individual Senators or as a body, or what this country could do as a Nation, to hasten the day when international controversies would lessen or diminish and when the United Nations would begin to function in accordance with the high purposes which are incorporated in its charter. It seemed to me that the unrest which exists in the world today, the confusion, and the antipathies were largely the result of fears on the part of one group of nations with respect to another group of nations, and vice versa, and that such fears had their roots largely in the possibility of a resort to arms to try the issue in the last analysis, and that therefore the quickest way, perhaps, in which progress could be made would be to try to start some action which, carried through its due course, might help the United Nations to get in a position where never again would the President of the United States have to ask Congress to take action in world affairs when there exists a body created for the primary purpose of performing such a function.

As a result of that thinking I have prepared some thoughts which I shall be glad to deliver for whatever force and worth they may have at this critical juncture in world affairs.

The address of President Truman to the Congress on March 12 revealed with complete and unmistakable clarity the impotence of the United Nations as presently constituted to deal effectively with international affairs.

I make that statement with extreme reluctance. I wish it were otherwise. I make it not in criticism, but simply to present a hard, cold, realistic circumstance.

The United Nations is as yet in its infancy; its aims and ideals are high and desirable.

But the truth of the matter is, it is at present but a hollow shell. It lacks money, power, and a police force with which to enforce law and order in this war-torn world. Even if it had money and an adequate police force at its disposal for the keeping of the world's peace, its ability to accomplish its objectives is extremely doubtful so long as any one nation, or group of nations, can array a larger and stronger force against it.

Up to this moment the United Nations has proved itself to be nothing more or less than a glorified debating society—nothing more or less than a glorified town meeting of the nations of the earth.

After World War I the nations of the earth for the most part joined the League of Nations. The United States did not. After World War II we corrected this mistake by leading in the formation of a new world organization which we call the United Nations.

We are all familiar with the fact that the League of Nations, after rendering some outstanding services, failed as a medium for keeping the peace and for the settlement of international disputes without bloodshed. In fact, it, too, was but an international debating society. It had no police force to enforce its decrees and was destined to fail as a peace-keeping body just as soon as any great power desired to make war on another power. The unarmed League existed in a world where large armaments were a part of the policy of every leading nation.

Are we to repeat this same failure in the United Nations and condemn mankind to annihilation and the world to the loss of many centuries of acquired civilization?

The League of Nations had no international police force to enforce its decrees. The United Nations has no international police force to enforce its decrees. After the League of Nations was born, all the nations of the world showed a transparent lack of faith in that institution by continuing to maintain large armies and navies just in case the League without a police force could not keep the peace.

At the present time, the United Nations, though now 2 years of age, is doomed to similar failure if the world follows the same course which it followed after the creation of the League. Notwithstanding their pledged word to settle all disputes through the United Nations without recourse to the battlefield, all of the great powers are still maintaining huge military establishments. In the meantime the United Nations has no military force.

On January 28 of last year I submitted the following resolution, which I resubmit today for appropriate reference—I presume to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the President is authorized and requested to invite the governments of all nations to send representatives to a conference, which shall be charged with the single duty of entering into an understanding and agreement to achieve world disarmament on land, on sea, and in the air by January 1, 1950, except only for such actual occupying forces, with appropriate weapons, and for such agreed period of time, as will be necessary to police the defeated and occupied nations as a result of the recent war, and except only for such armed forces and for such weapons as are to be placed exclusively under the jurisdiction of the Security Council of the United Nations, and except only for such limited forces and limited small arms as are needed to keep law and order within each country, and directly prohibiting the manufacture, storage, and possession of all other weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war, and providing further for an international inspection force authorized and instructed to see that the terms of such world disarmament are rigidly adhered to and carried out, and thereafter maintained by all the countries of the earth.

Recently, there have been discussions and proposals in the United Nations for controlling atomic energy and the atomic bomb. Other weapons for the most part have not been mentioned.

Ever since the atomic bomb was first used against Japan, it has provoked world-wide discussion. Its potentialities for death and destruction stagger our imaginations. In their early crude form, two of these bombs in a fraction of second wiped out two of Japan's largest cities. This event struck terror throughout the world. We all know now that if World War III comes, with the atomic bomb, it will transcend a thousandfold the dreadfulness of World War I and II, combined.

We are told that in the next war the battlefield will constitute but a small part of the area through which wanton death and indescribable destruction will rage. In the next war, they say, men, women, and children in the great cities will be recklessly slaughtered by the tens of millions. The work of 20 centuries of building and progress will be undone in a single day. We are told that when that war is over, such security as will then exist will be in the keeping of armed bands, fighting for the most part only for survival. Such a war would wreck the earth itself, and would be the end of everything we value.

The threatening terror of an atomic bomb war has arrested our thinking in other directions. We seem oblivious to the merciless slaughter and wide devastation of the last war, even without the atomic bomb, in Europe and Africa and Asia. We seem to have forgotten the possible use of bacteriological warfare which, if employed—fortunately, in the last two wars it was not employed—but, if employed, can start scourges and plagues which will slay millions from pole to pole.

Likewise we fail to remember the death-dealing possibilities of the new poison gases which silently strike both on the battlefield and on the nonmilitary town and city. We seem to have forgotten the possibilities of the rocket, the V–1 and V–2, and of other flying bombs which can wing their way near the stars on flights of hundreds of miles on their evil missions of destruction. We have overlooked, it seems, the wholesale slaughter of mankind with weapons that have been standard since World War I.

The tens of millions who lie dead, the tens of millions of maimed and broken, the widespread destruction of cities, the barbarism, the infinite cruelty and tortures of the concentration camp, the hundreds of thousands of homeless and displaced persons, the empty treasuries of once financially strong governments, have all been temporarily forgotten before the majestic devastation wrought by the atom bomb.

The reasoning of the moment is, "Only control the atomic bomb, and war without it is still bearable." So it seems that prevention of World War III is not now topmost in the minds of men. The control of the atomic bomb now occupies this place.

Let us explore for a moment what will happen if the United Nations succeeds in controlling or even outlawing the manufacture and use of the atomic bomb, and if we stop at approximately that point. Let us assume that in the near future all the nations of the world will agree not to manufacture, not to store, nor to possess, and never again to use the atomic bomb. Let us assume that an international inspection force is set up to see that these pledges are relentlessly carried out. Let us assume that the pledges in reality are carried out, and that not a single atomic bomb is being made or is in the possession of any country on earth. Then let us assume that because of some future disagreement between nations, World War III really comes to pass, anyhow. Every realist knows that immediately upon the outbreak of World War III, the treaties governing the prohibition of the manufacture, possession, and use of the atomic bomb will be set at naught. Every nation that can do so will at once begin its manufacture. Nations will feel compelled to do so for fear that their enemies will do it first. When these bombs are made, they will be used by one or another of the nations who are parties to the conflict.

Then where do we stand? All the work of the United Nations to outlaw the use of the atomic bomb will then be undone in a fraction of a second, once World War III breaks out. By every rule of logic and necessity, atomic bombs are certain to be used if another war comes. In spite of any treaties or agreements against its manufacture and use, in spite of all honest efforts by nations to prohibit its use, it seems as certain as anything on this earth can be, that at some time during the next war the atomic bomb is sure to be used.

If this is true, nothing is accomplished by outlawing the atomic bomb between wars. It would not be used between wars, anyhow. If another war comes, no treaty prohibiting the bomb will prevent its use. The simple logic of this thinking brings us to a startling conclusion: It is not, as we supposed, the atomic bomb in itself that we fear at all. What haunts our days and crowds our nights with terror in the coming of World War III. We know for certain that if World War III does come, the atomic bomb will come with it, and all will then be gone.

So at long last we have come to know that it is World War III that we fear. If we can prevent the coming of that war, the atomic bomb, bacteriological warfare, poison gases, the rocket, the flying bomb, and all other weapons will take care of themselves. But is the United Nations and are all of us centering our efforts on the prevention of World War III? Frankly, I do not believe so.

Since all nations must look to the United Nations and its successful working for our hope of survival on this planet, it now becomes absolutely indispensable that we reexamine the United Nations, and particularly its Charter, with most thorough particularity.

From a careful reading of it, we learn that the great mission of the United Nations is world security and that is our hope. Indeed, the most potent and decisive branch of the United Nations is actually called the Security Council. The idea of world security dominates and permeates the whole philosophy of the 19 chapters and the 111 articles which together compose the entire United Nations Charter.

Tragically enough, there does not appear in its purposes and principles a single word or phrase devoted to the only sure method of making the work of the United Nations an ultimate success.

Mr. President, there is in the charter no declaration of purpose or principle, no stated objective, for eventual world disarmament, although by inference, in several instances, the words "world disarmament" are used. Yet, it seems clear that if the world's peace is to be unbroken, such accomplishment is impossible without full and proved trust and faith between nations. The United Nations is doomed to failure unless the member nations use its services, rather than the battlefield, for the settlement of their disputes.

If the nations intend to use only the United Nations for such purposes, then all well and good. If they do not intend to use the United Nations, but to rely instead on their own armed forces, then all should know that.

It is important for the United States to know it, and I imagine every other country would want to know it. It is imperative for the security of our own country that we have an answer to the question whether or not we are to rely on the United Nations, or whether or not we are to rely upon ourselves. We cannot put our faith in one institution and use guns in another. We must be consistent if we are to have a policy which will protect the people of this Nation, and under which we will hope to bring peace and order to the world. Only if nations rely on the United Nations can we plan at home and abroad, and take the wise course in the circumstances which from time to time will arise.

It does not appear, with the limited time at the world's disposal, that the UN is endeavoring to secure a united decision from its members as to which of the two courses are hereafter to be followed. And when one reads through the Charter and finds that world disarmament, under proper safeguards, has been omitted from the purposes and principles of that document, our fears for the future are greatly heightened.

Why, I ask, are the purposes and principles in the Charter silent on eventual world disarmament—on the indispensable requisite for the use of the UN rather than the battlefield for the settlement of international disputes?

If all the nations of the world mean what they profess, then why do the United States, Great Britain, Russia, France, China, and so on through the long roll call, continue to mass at home military power, greater than the world has ever heretofore seen? All the while their delegates to the UN talk only of the control of the atomic bomb. Is war without the atomic bomb a bearable institution? Does it become unbearable only when the atomic bomb is added to the other weapons of destruction? If World War III comes, and this bomb is to be used anyway, why not try to avoid that war by the process of total world disarmament, save for small and appropriately armed forces in each nation sufficient to keep the peace; and save for such forces as are pledged exclusively for the use of the UN, together with an international inspection force capable of maintaining this state, once it is reached?

Is the faith of our own country in the UN and our trust in the pledged word of the other member nations so weak that we must maintain the greatest Navy, the greatest Air Force, and perhaps the most efficient Army the world has ever seen?

To answer my own question, I would say yes, as of the present.

Is the faith and trust of the British in this indispensable enterprise—the UN—so shallow and fleeting that it, too, relies on one of the greatest armadas, one of the most powerful air forces, and one of the greatest armies in the world?

To answer my own question, I would say yes, at this juncture it is not strong enough in its faith to rely on the UN understandably, but rather now relies upon its own ability to defend itself.

Is the faith and trust of mighty Russia in the workings of this last hope of mankind so flimsy and unsubstantial that while nominally adhering to the lofty purposes and principles of this international organization, it still desires to keep millions of men armed with every conceivable weapon, always readily available?

Indeed, Mr. President, is the faith of all countries now staggering under the wasteful expense and harsh deprivation caused by all-out preparedness so feeble that they must continue to maintain, to broaden, and to extend their present great military establishments?

Truly, if the future accomplishments of the UN are to be measured by the yardstick of its present actions and objectives then we are indeed leaning on a very fragile and insufficient reed.

In this state of a world armed to the teeth we cannot further rely on the UN, as now constituted, for our own protection. If this condition continues, it is obvious that we must rely only on ourselves.

What becomes of the principles and purposes of the UN as it attempts to enforce its decrees, when the position of the United States, or Britain, or Russia on any international question is backed up in each country by an invincible military establishment?

What becomes of the pledge made by each nation that it will "discharge in good faith the obligations assumed" if huge, armed establishments are to be maintained by all of them, just in case?

The Charter specifies: "All parties shall refrain from the threat or the use of armed force." If this clause is to be observed, do not the existing world-wide armaments make of it but a mockery? Is not their very maintenance a threat to all other nations, great and small?

Mr. President, sadly enough, the words "world disarmament" are not to be found anywhere stated in the purposes and principles of this world organization.

Mr. President, when we contrast words with action, the United Nations' purposes and principles with its initial objective of "controlling the atomic bomb," we are led into a field of unrivaled contradiction. On the one hand, we have the picture of all nations solemnly pledging their faith and support to the United Nations as the instrument for settling international disputes without bloodshed, and at the same time retaining and even enlarging their wartime armaments.

Thus, it looks to me as if we are repeating once more the same vital error which laid the League of Nations low. Most nations pledged their faith in the League, but at the same time they made a mockery of this pledge by openly demonstrating that their real faith was in their own great armaments, and in nothing else. Had they been relying on the League for the settlement of disputes, such armaments would have been unnecessary.

I make the challenge that, except for such forces as are needed to maintain order in the defeated countries and keep the peace at home, the maintenance of large military forces shows such a lack of trust and faith in the United Nations as to render it a futile agency for preventing World War III.

Unless this program of world disarmament as I have qualified it is immediately undertaken by the United Nations, there is grave danger that the United Nations will be but a snare and a delusion, and that it will be ultimately doomed as the most colossal and sad failure of all the institutions created by mankind throughout history. We are embracing again the same hypocrisy which bedeviled the League of Nations, and in time wrecked it on the rocks of world rearmament.

What a travesty. Here we have the spectacle of 51 of the greatest nations on earth renouncing war forever as an instrument of national policy, and proclaiming their allegiance to the UN in its operations to keep the peace, at the same time parading their armed might on land, on sea, and in the air, on a scale never before witnessed on the face of the earth.

What the man in the street in this and every other country wants is larger and sterner stuff. The hour demands it. He does not want to have created a debating society to discuss mere details for world security while all the world marches burdened by heavy armaments, and when international conditions grow no better. He wants action on a broad scale which will strip this world of the threat of another war. He wants real, not professed, world security. He wants complete and absolute disarmament on land, sea, and in the air by every country on the face of the earth, and he wants to have provided an inspection force sufficiently large and clothed with such authority as to be able to make certain that the state of disarmament, when reached, is thereafter maintained religiously. He wants placed at the exclusive disposal of the UN a well organized police force ready and able to halt all violators of this concept.

There is only one way, Mr. President, that the good faith of the members of the UN can be proved—not two ways, or three; only one. There is only one way that the UN and its member nations can show to the world that this time all the nations really mean business.

And mark carefully the words I am about to utter: What we must control, Mr. President, is not the atomic bomb, not the scientists who make it, but the ability to make war; or all our pious gestures are as empty words. In short, we must as a world control ourselves, and the people of all other nations must control themselves. There is no other method. There is only one road to peace, and unless we take that road our institutions, our species, this planet itself is threatened, and it may not survive.

Mr. President, we no longer have a choice in the matter. Either we outlaw war and make that mandate work, or there is no survival ultimately for anyone on this planet. Yes, Mr. President, I feel our problem is just that simple. This has been apparent since the first small atomic bomb demonstrated its destructive capacity. It is even truer now when we know that in spite of everything we may do to control the atomic bomb in the meantime, if World War III comes, an improved atomic bomb will come with it, as surely as there is a roof on this Senate Chamber.

As an American, I believe that we ought to do one thing or the other. The United States must either keep fully prepared in all categories, including the atomic bomb, or there must be total disarmament, including the atomic bomb, for all nations of the globe, ourselves included. We will not contribute to the peace of the world by further disarmament here in the United States, by way of example for other nations to follow. I want to emphasize that I am not arguing or pleading for or advocating a disarmament of the United States in this world. I want its defenses to be strong, and I want them to be adequate to meet and cope with any possible, conceivable danger to which our Nation might be subjected. I would be opposed to disarmament by this country as an example to the world.

What I am pleading for is a schedule of disarmament agreed to by the great nations, and, when agreed to, carried out step by step under the eyes of international inspectors, until the last vestige of the agreed disarmament has been achieved. I do not want anyone to leave this Chamber with the idea that I am for disarmament as a means of affording an example. I would fight it with every ounce of strength I possess. To the best of my ability and influence and vote I would keep up our Army, our Navy, and our Air Force, so long as other nations keep up theirs and make such action on our part necessary.

What I am advocating is that the nations of the world sit down together at a conference devoted to the simple purpose I have suggested and try to arrive at a plan which, over a period of years, will make the force at the disposal of the United Nations so strong that no one nation will dare to attack it, and that nations retain only such armed forces within their own countries, equipped perhaps only with small arms, as are necessary to keep the peace. If anyone does not like that plan, I ask him, what is the alternative? Shall we drift from one international crisis to another? But yesterday it was Korea, or Azerbaijan, or Poland, or Hungary, or communism in the Balkans, in Korea, or in China. But a year ago it was Great Britain, when the British loan was up. Four days ago it was Greece and Turkey. What will it be tomorrow?

What is fear behind it all? The fear is that out of each one of these little bonfires, where the sparks of discord have fallen, a flame may be lighted that will start a conflagration which will spread over the entire world. If Russia in good faith were to disarm tomorrow, if that were possible, and we were to disarm tomorrow, and all other nations were to disarm, and the United Nations had an adequate force to keep the peace, in my judgment many international antipathies and difficulties would vanish like the morning mist.

Back of all these movements, which cost terrific sums of money, drain our natural resources, and quite often take an unconscionable toll of human life, is fear that some other nation may be the stronger, and therefore these moves must be made on the international checkerboard as a part of international or national defense.

Mr. President, we no longer have a choice in this matter. What will conduce to the world's peace is for us either to be so strong that all nations will respect the force at our command or for us to join with all other nations in world disarmament; for in such a world we would have no need of armed forces to gain our rightful ends. But what are we doing, and what is every other nation on earth doing now? Pious words, signed and sworn statements of adherence and faith in the UN, and, at the same time, millions of men are kept under arms; which, unless we move faster to encompass and enfold these aims and purposes in the arms of reality, makes of the United Nations Charter, and of this whole movement, one of the greatest frauds ever perpetrated on the honest people of the earth. If the United Nations is not going to be put in condition where it can discharge the great work for which it was created, in my individual capacity and on my responsibility as a Senator in this body, I want to know it.

I do not want to have one foot in the UN and one foot in the War Department. We ought to have an answer, "Yes" or "No." Let us suppose that the President were to issue such an invitation, and that some of the great nations would refuse to attend it. All well and good. At least we would know they were unwilling to sit down and discuss world disarmament and the creation of a police force in the United Nations, and to constitute and give the right-of-way to an inspection force that could go anywhere to see that the United Nations agreement was carried out.

As of today I and other Americans are looking with hope and longing to the UN. I am not saying what I am saying in order to belittle it. I am not saying it particularly to criticize the UN. It is doing the best it can with the tools we have given to it. I want to make of it what we all said it was to be, and end this sham and pretense once and for all, or, and if we cannot do that, then in God's name at least we can defend ourselves as best we can. But let us have an answer "Yes" or "No." Is the world to live by the UN or it is to live behind the might and force of the economic power and armies of the great nations?

What we and all other nations want and are entitled to have is a clear answer as to which of these policies we must all hereafter pursue for our own protection. If we are going to support the UN, and I favor supporting it, then all nations should be willing to disarm. If we are not going to put our faith in the UN—and the other nations of the world—then it is imperative for our own national security that we never again be caught unprepared.

I think we are entitled to an immediate answer to this question.

Mr. President, this matter is so important to all nations—to all mankind—that the United States of America should and must take the lead in promoting and consummating it.

It should be a single and separate undertaking. And mark these words. The issue as to whether we are to rely on the UN, or upon our own defenses, should be settled. This country is at present the most powerful in all the world on land, sea, and in the air. Its wealth is greater than that of any other nation. It is in the prime position of leadership. The world knows it has no hidden plans for conquest. The world knows it has but lately voluntarily given to the Philippines and its 18,000,000 citizens complete and absolute independence. The President of the United States thus at this time occupies the enviable position of primary world leadership. The prestige of his great office and the prestige of our great country should stand behind the purposes for which such an international meeting is called.

I do not believe, and it now seems conclusive, that the UN is equipped to initiate successfully a task of this magnitude.

It is likely that for some time to come the UN will be asked to consider a tremendous multitude of problems. In its Assembly, the voice of India undoubtedly will be frequently raised, concerning independence. So will it be with the people of the East Indies, with French Indochina, and with the peoples of other countries who may consider themselves subjugated peoples.

There will be debate about Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, about the Polish territories and the Polish people, about Greece and Turkey and the Dardanelles, Iran, and parts of China. Questions will arise about the annexation of the defeated countries, about the rights of minorities; questions of the distribution of certain of the earth's areas deemed of great economic or military value; questions of trusteeship; questions of international trade, tariffs, and embargoes; questions of immigration, of currency stabilization and depreciation; Palestine and the Jewish question; questions affecting air and sea commerce, bases, and travel; questions of international labor, health, education, and standards of living, and the like. Important as these are, they are all secondary to the business of establishing and keeping the peace of the earth; to preventing the outbreak of world war III.

Undoubtedly the settlement of many of these controversies by the UN is important. Their proper settlement will conduce to the world peace we long for, but such matters require time, time, time.

The body that takes up the question of world disarmament should not be hindered, side-tracked, or delayed by any other problem. World disarmament is in itself such a gigantic undertaking as to require a singleness of thought, action, and purpose on the part of those who seek to bring it about. Hence a conference of all nations should be called to be devoted exclusively to the accomplishment of this work. Such a conference will be faced with many, many difficult decisions—what disarmament is to consist of, what forces shall be made available exclusively to the UN, the number of men to be contributed by each nation, the weapons that such a force may employ; where these forces and weapons are to be stationed; how to effect the destruction of the remaining weapons not placed under the control of the UN or retained in each nation for law and order purposes; the composition of the international inspection force with world-wide authority to see that the program is carried out and the state of disarmament thereafter maintained, and so on, and so on.

Obviously such a gigantic task should not be confused by what is taking place in Iran, or Poland, or China, or Palestine, or with trusteeships or with tariffs and embargoes, with currency stabilization, and the hundred and one other problems which sooner or later will confront the UN.

Moreover this quest for world-wide peace is so transcendental in its importance to all of us that the representatives who meet in such a conference should have the assurance in advance that no other issue or problem is to receive their attention, save world disarmament and questions related thereto. Only in such an atmosphere can such a project be brought to fruition, and the world given a prospect of real and lasting peace.

For all these reasons, plus the fact that the United States occupies a position of primary world leadership, our President, our Senate, and our country should take the lead in this indispensable work. No other nation can do so with equal hope of success. The UN is not constituted to do it as well or as quickly because of the reasons outlined, because of the time factor, and because it is not primarily concerned with this problem alone.

Yet, all the while, even as I am standing here, great armaments remain. All the while the arms race is on. We may be sure that other nations are now working on the creation and manufacture of the atomic bomb and on improvements thereto. We may be sure that the development of the rocket and the buzz bomb—the V–1 and V–2—is progressing everywhere. We are certain that research into and manufacture of gas and disease germs is continuing. No one doubts that work on inventing and perfecting other new weapons is being carried on by the great powers of this earth.

In the present world situation all nations continue to straddle. They rely half on the UN to settle international disputes, and half on their own mighty armaments to settle these disputes, just in case. If the world continues to straddle, all is lost.

Mr. President, let us face the obvious truth. How can the UN enforce its decrees against a nation which is as strong on its own soil as is the remainder of the world combined?

Can the UN enforce its decision on the United States so long as we keep the most powerful Navy and Air Force, supplemented by a large and efficient Army and perhaps supported by universal military training? Can the UN enforce its decrees on Russia so long as the Russians keep 10,000,000 men under arms and a great air force ever at their disposal? Can the UN enforce its decrees on France if the French create another standing army of a million men, with four or five million more, trained and equipped, in reserve, as has been her custom?

Finally, Mr. President, since Germany and Japan are not to be permitted to rearm, why do the five great allies maintain a combined navy 1,000 times greater than the remainder of the world, a combined air force a thousand times greater than all others added together, and a combined army 10,000 times greater than all such existing forces in the remainder of the world?

It is as plain as the nose on one's face that the great armed forces of our own country are being maintained principally for possible use against Russia, Britain, France, or China, since Germany and Japan are to be kept disarmed.

Is it not plain, too, that Russia is maintaining her armed forces for possible use against Britain or the United States or France or China?

Is it not as certain as anything can be that armaments and personnel are today being maintained by each of the five great friendly powers, not against the defeated countries which have already been occupied, but against each other? We and all our recent allies are now maintaining our armed might against each other. Yet all the Allies, the blood brothers of World War II, have sworn to settle all disputes by peaceful means, and never, never, never again to use war or the threat of war as an instrument of national policy.

Mr. President, if one lives in a peaceful community with only four neighbors, how long will they remain friends if each one knows that the other keeps a machine-gun behind his door? So long as that continues, each of the five neighbors will want to have a better machine gun than the other and more ammunition to use if need should come. Thus, as between nations, suspicion will continue to grow.

So it is with the world. After the great lessons of World Wars I and II, must all nations continue to move in an atmosphere of distrust, suspicion, and fear—largely of each other—while all mankind is burdened down with ever-increasing armaments?

In this very Congress we shall probably appropriate approximately $11,000,000,000, largely because our friends are armed. We could use that $11,000,000,000 in a great many ways if we were not afraid of our friends.

So long as these armaments remain every realist knows that it is to such armaments and not to the operations of the UN that the nations really look for their own protection.

Mr. President, the time has come to confront the naked truth. The time has come to face the facts. The time has come for us to make the great decision which will mean the survival or the end of all civilization. The time has come to make the UN the living, potent, decisive factor in the affairs of men and nations, which 51 nations of the globe have pledged their sacred word that it shall be. The time has come for world disarmament, to make this pledge a reality.

Unless it comes we, too, must always be fully prepared. We must have the biggest army and navy and air force in the world, or at least the most effective. We must have more atomic bombs and the men and weapons which will insure their quick use in our hour of need. We must pay the crushing taxes. We must have universal military training. We must reduce our scale of living in order to do this. We must submit to unbelievable regimentation for our Nation in peacetime. We must be prepared in a world that is armed to the teeth.

Without world disarmament, we must be prepared, UN or no UN, to spring instantly to our country's defense. The next war will leave us no time to get ready. If we are not ready at its outbreak, we will likely be too late. There will be no "next time" in which to amend our tardiness.

Therefore, let us frankly put this question to all nations and to all people. Let us get the answer as to whether this world straddle is to end—whether the world is to be an armed camp henceforth, relying on might for the achievement of its desires, or whether it is to prove its faith and trust in the UN by world-wide disarmament on land, sea, and in the air, save for the forces necessary in Germany and Japan, and for maintaining order internally, and for an international inspecton force to see that that world disarmament, once achieved, is never again overthrown.

It is not necessary to detail the colossal advantages which will flow to our own and all other countries with the accomplishment of world disarmament. We know that the burdens of taxation which heavy armaments entail will be lifted instantly from the toiling masses all over the world; that in one fell swoop the shackles of regimentation which war and the threat of war impose on every man will be struck off.

Instead, the wealth and resources of our own Nation and all others will then be available for food, shelter, clothing, hospitals, roads, schools, libraries, and all manner of other things which make for progress and civilization. Take the tremendous expense of war off the backs of the people who toil, and much of the problem of world relief will solve itself.

I dislike to use this illustration, but I should like to present it simply to prove my point: For the cost of a single new battleship the physical properties of Yale and Harvard Universities could be duplicated. Think of it. For the cost of a single battleship a wide highway could be built from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, or a new Congressional Library could be erected. As these things can come to the United States, so can they come in proportionate measure to all other countries on the globe. Moreover, these benefits to all mankind can be used and enjoyed in a world free from fear and threat of war, with all its horrible modern-day implications.

In conclusion, Mr. President, this matter, in my judgment, is more important than the mere control of the atomic bomb or the control of atomic energy, although that is one of the most important things in the world, for the reasons I have stated. If world disarmament succeeds, the atomic bomb is not merely controlled, it is prohibited, and all other devastating weapons with it. That is as far as man can safeguard his future.

This great work is more important than strike legislation, than balancing the budget, than the effort to provide new houses, full employment, or any other matter now before our own or any other nation on the face of the earth.

We remember that the League of Nations failed not alone because the United States did not aline itself with it, but largely because, while it was set up to settle international disputes without bloodshed, all the member nations continued to maintain, increase, and parade tremendous armies. This made the league a foredoomed failure.

Someone may say, as I have said to myself, "If the President sends this invitation to the nations of the world, perhaps they will not come." That is what I want to know. If they do not come, I shall know where lies the force that does not want the United Nations to function as its charter visualizes. Or if they do come someone may say, "Nations X, Y, and Z will not permit the kind of inspection which we must have." If that be true, that is what I want to know, because then I shall know that I cannot rely on the United Nations to keep the peace. It is somewhat like the War Labor Board, it may prevent a strike, but there is no guarantee that it will. I know that in the last analysis, if the hope of world cooperation to keep the peace has vanished, we must rely on our own ability to defend ourselves.

So it is not that I foresee failure if a conference such as I have suggested is called, but at least if it does fail for the reasons I have mentioned, we shall have information which is vital to the existence of this Nation, and we can legislate with greater clarity and certainty as to the course we should then pursue.

On the other hand, suppose it should succeed: What a boon to mankind that would be!

Through our representatives in the United Nations, we are again about to embrace disarmament by example. At this point I should like to pay as great a tribute as I am capable of to the very able and distinguished Presiding Officer, the President pro tempore of this body [Mr. VANDENBERG] and to his colleague, the distinguished and able Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] for the great work which they did in setting up this institution. It was a difficult task. There were difficulties to be ironed out, and they deserve the everlasting gratitude of mankind. But we could erect a finer tribute and monument to their great work if we could make the United Nations the great institution which I know each of them wants it to be and for which they labored so long and so well.

Now that we, through our representatives in the United Nations, are about to embrace disarmament by example again, through the control of the atomic bomb only, just as we controlled the building of battleships in 1922; now that we are considering foreign loans again—we made loans of $14,000,000,000 after the last war of which foreign governments spent a large portion to increase their armaments; and loans have been made or proposed to Britain, Greece and Turkey, and there will be other public or private loans tomorrow—now that we are considering foreign loans again, with which nations will, at least in part, add to their own strength while relatively weakening ours, we must know what the policies of the great powers on armaments are to be hereafter. Now that we have once again set up an international organization for the peaceful settlement of international disputes, we must know that this time it is really to have power and scope so that it will not fail. If it is not to have them, we must know that.

I want to reemphasize the fact that disarmament is a very difficult thing to achieve. It might be that if the President were to call this conference it would be a failure; but we would know the reason for the failure, and if the failure went to the fundamentals of the United Nations we would know that so long as that circumstance existed or the nation responsible for the failure kept its present government there would be no hope of the United Nations occupying the position for which it was created. Perhaps it will fail. I am becoming a little weary of hearing people say, "Why don't we turn this, that or the other problem over to the United Nations?" The United Nations has no money; it has no police force. The idea that we should put up the money and the police force and then let somebody else spend the money and operate the organization does not make a great deal of headway with me, at least when I first hear it.

The voices of all mankind, if they could be registered in every country, would, I believe, support the proposition of world disarmament. The people of the world are for it if it can be achieved and carried out and an inspection force can be established so that it can be guaranteed. But if we cannot have that kind of an inspection force we cannot have world disarmament. We will know who stopped it, and we can focus the attention of all the world on the nation or nations preventing mankind from saving themselves.

The millions of brave dead who lie in the scattered graves of World Wars I and II died for this ideal of real peace on earth. The mothers and fathers, the widows and orphans of those who are no more, want this enduring monument as partial compensation for their great and irretrievable loss. Otherwise they have died largely in vain. The tens of millions who still carry the yoke of misery, fear, and want imposed by war want this new day of permanent peace to dawn quickly; if man can make it dawn.

The continuance of civilization itself is in the balance. If we cannot achieve this ideal, as I look down the corridor of time to the declining years of my own life, or shortly beyond, this land we love and indeed the whole earth face a consequence so dire that no mortal can give thought or tongue to express it. That is how important it is. At some point 5, 10, 15, 20, 30, 40, or 50 years down the corridor of time either we must get this world straightened out on a basis of law and order, international inspection and disarmament, or this country and all of Christendom will be faced with the greatest danger in all the history of the human race. I am sure that is a gross understatement. It may be that the United Nations will do this in time. Perhaps its processes, slow and cumbersome as they are, will achieve it; but I believe it is important for the Senate to invite the President to undertake it by calling a conference devoted to this purpose, because the life and the happiness of the people of this country and of the entire world depend upon it.

The war has been over for 2 years. The sands in the hourglass are not so plentiful as they used to be, and they are growing less and less with each passing hour. It is 1947 now. It will be 1948 soon. It will be 1950 soon. No really aggressive action that I have seen on the whole front has been taken to accomplish this objective.

Let the United States, the impregnable fortress of freedom, the lover of peace, the hope of oppressed people the world over, take the lead in summoning all the nations of the earth to a world disarmament conference, and bring into reality the fervent hope, the earnest prayers, and the longing of men through all the centuries for the untroubled security of a just, unbroken, and enduring peace.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 95), submitted by Mr. TYDINGS, was received, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is authorized and requested to invite the governments of all nations to send representatives to a conference, which shall be charged with the single duty of entering into an understanding and agreement to achieve world disarmament on land, on sea, and in the air by January 1, 1950, except only for such actual occupying forces, with appropriate weapons, and for such agreed period of time, as will be necessary to police the defeated and occupied nations as a result of the recent war, and except only for such armed forces and for such weapons as are to be placed exclusively under the jurisdiction of the Security Council of the United Nations Organization, and except only for such limited forces and limited small arms as are needed to keep law and order within each country, and directly prohibiting the manufacture, storage, and possession of all other weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war, and providing further for the international inspection force authorized and instructed to see that the terms of such world disarmament are rigidly adhered to and carried out, and thereafter maintained by all the countries of the earth.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, yesterday on the floor of the Senate a question was raised by the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] with respect to the constitutionality of House bill 2157, as reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee. He also raised a question relative to the parliamentary situation. As I recall his words, he stated that if the President pro tempore had considered more than the strict provisions of the portal-to-portal bill, he would not have had it referred to the Judiciary Committee; and the Senator from Illinois took the position that it was referred to that committee primarily because of the constitutional questions involved.

I should like to point out to the distinguished Senator from Illinois that so far as the parliamentary situation is concerned, the Committee on the Judiciary handled the Gwynne bill last year. When House bill 2157 came to the Senate from the House of Representatives, it was referred to the Judiciary Committee, which proceeded to handle it and hold hearings on it. If I am correctly informed, not only did the Judiciary Committee consider House bill 2157, but it also considered a bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and, as I recall, another bill, which went even further than did the bill of the Senator from Indiana. The last-mentioned bill not only provided for relief in portal-to-portal cases, but extended the broad provisions of the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act not only to orders administered by the wages and hours administrative agency, but to orders administered by other agencies, such as the War Labor Board and other agencies which had issued such orders. So, Mr. President, from a parliamentary point of view, I am satisfied that the Senate Judiciary Committee is wholly within its rights, and should have jurisdiction of the bill, and has ample authority to warrant having jurisdiction of it.

The distinguished Senator from Illinois also said that because he thought there was no evidence before the Congress of an emergency which would support the enactment of legislation affecting liability under the Walsh-Healey

Act and the Bacon-Davis Act or with respect to cases under the Fair Labor Standards Act going beyond the strict portal-to-portal problems, it seemed to him that it was impossible to enact legislation which would meet the provisions of the fifth amendment to the Constitution. Let me say that in the Seventy-ninth Congress the Judiciary Committee not only considered but reported to the Senate what is known as the Gwynne bill. In the proceedings of the Seventy-ninth Congress on Juy 29, 1946, beginning at page 10516 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, we find that the so-called Gwynne bill was brought up on the floor of the Senate, was debated, and was passed on that day. At that time its provisions were discussed, and during the course of the debate the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] stated on the floor of the Senate:

I should like to ask the majority leader a question. As I understand, the period has now changed from 2 years to 3 years?

He was speaking of the statutory period of limitations which was provided for in the bill. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] replied, "Yes."

Then the following occurred:

Mr. MAGNUSON. Is the so-called good-faith clause still in the bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is still in the amendment.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That appears to be satisfactory to all sides.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is, so far as I can discover.

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that the 3-year period is satisfactory to those on whose behalf I was objecting. Thirty-seven jurisdictions have a period of 3 years or more, so this provision meets a great deal of the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 2788) was read the third time and passed.

So, Mr. President, there is no doubt that the Senate of the United States has heretofore considered, in the Seventy-ninth Congress, not only all the facts which were presented by the Judiciary Committee on strictly portal-to-portal legislation, as to which the distinguished Senator from Illinois has spoken, but also the broader provisions included in the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act and the good-faith clause which has been referred to, as well as the reliance clause which was considered in connection with the provisions of the Wages and Hours Act. So, to my mind, the facts have been presented; there can be no question about them; and now we are legislating on that basis.

Furthermore, in answer to the distinguished Senator's question as to whether we can go beyond the broad provisions of strictly portal-to-portal legislation, let me say, I think the real answer, insofar as the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act are concerned, is that the evidence before the Senate and the House committees on the pending portal-to-portal suits is equally applicable to support legislation affecting all three acts, for the simple reason that the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts involve payments for hours worked. The Supreme Court's definition of work in the Mount Clemens case has raised potential liabilities under all three acts. While the pending flood of portal litigation has so far been limited to section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act, yet no legislation can deal completely with the emergency unless it removes the similar potential liability, which in many cases is concurrent, under sections 2 and 6 of the Walsh-Healey Act and section 3 (b) of the Bacon-Davis Act. No evidence is necessary to support this conclusion by Congress; it is a matter of law.

But, if evidence is thought to be necessary, let me point to the evidence of some of the witnesses who testified. Last night I ran through the hearings and the committee report. I find that one of the witnesses who testified before the House subcommittee gave specific instances, at pages 427, 429, 451, and 452, showing that the same emergency which exists under the Fair Labor Standards Act is present under the Walsh-Healey Act with respect to changed interpretations or coverage, basic rate, and executive exemption, as well as hours worked.

As to evidence of the need for legislation going beyond the strict limits of portal-to-portal activities—namely, the settlement provisions, the statute of limitations, and the good-faith provisions—the record of the hearings before both the Senate and the House Judiciary Committees contains a large amount of evidence fully supporting broad and comprehensive provisions on those subjects.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate to read the specific excerpts from the testimony of the witnesses on the points I have mentioned, but I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a summary or memorandum giving excerpts of the testimony of the various witnesses, including Mr. Smethurst; Mr. Patton; Mr. Howard; Mr. Rice; Mr. Caldwell; Mr. Young; Mr. Waterhouse; Mr. Walling, the then Wage and Hour Administrator; Mr. William C. Foster; a representative of the American Retail Coal Association; a representative of the National Retail Farm Equipment Association; a representative of the National Retail Hardware Association; a representative of the National Lumber Dealers Association; a representative of the National Sand and Gravel Association; a representative of the National Ready Mixed Concrete Association; and others, including Milton Smith, of the United States Chamber of Commerce; W. R. Noble, of the National Retail Farm Equipment Association; Joseph T. King; James L. Newbold; Robert B. Beach; Emil S. Neufeld; a representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation; a representative of the American Institute of Laundering; Stanley T. Posner; Almon E. Roth; Jack G. Scott; William T. Jobe; Roland Rice; H. E. Foreman; and others. They testified not only strictly in connection with the portal-to-portal legislation, but also as to aspects of this bill which relate to the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act. So I ask unanimous consent that the memorandum to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Raymond S. Smethurst, counsel for the National Association of Manufacturers, testified (at p. 101) that there exist today other phases of retroactivity under the Fair Labor Standards Act which can equal, or even exceed, the liability so far presented in portal-to-portal litigation. He presented specific facts as to problems regarding the regular rate involving penalty pay and bonuses (pp. 106–107); area of production (pp. 108–109); the executive exemption (p. 110); and the retail and service establishment exemption (p. 111). His testimony specifically supported a broad 1-year statute of limitations (p. 111); a broad provision protecting employers acting in compliance with administrative regulations, interpretations, or enforcement practices (p. 112); and a broad provision authorizing settlement and compromises of claims (p. 113).

Thomas F. Patton, general counsel for Republic Steel Corp., in his statement, specifically supported the need for and validity of a broad good-faith provision (pp. 60, 61); as well as a general statute of limitations (p. 62).

Thomas W. Howard, of the United States Chamber of Commerce, referred to the vital public interest in amending the Fair Labor Standards Act to clear up uncertainties as to coverage (p. 128). He cited specific cases, showing the huge liabilities being built up as a result of progressive extension of the interstate commerce concept under the act (pp. 130–131). He specifically recommended the adoption of a broad settlement provision as a solution to the doubtful exemption cases (p. 132) and recommended a broad provision protecting employers acting in good-faith reliance upon administrative rulings or interpretations (p. 133).

Roland Rice, general counsel of the American Trucking Associations, testified at length on the tremendous potential liability and the serious effects on the transportation industry arising out of revised administrative and judicial interpretations of the interstate commerce exemption under the Fair Labor Standards Act (pp. 333–335). He referred to specific pending suits.

Robert T. Caldwell, general counsel for Associated Industries of Kentucky, in support of his recommendations on the adoption of a general broad settlement provision, used as an illustration actual cases involving liability under the executive exemption provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act (pp. 408–409).

Howard I. Young, president, American Zinc, Lead & Smelting Co., speaking on behalf of St. Louis industry generally presented in the course of his testimony a resolution of the East St. Louis Chamber of Commerce specifically recommending broad and general provisions on settlement, elimination of liquidated damages, and good faith (p. 462).

Frederick H. Waterhouse, counsel for the Manufacturers Association of Connecticut, specifically recommended a general provision on liquidated damages (p. 492) and a general provision on settlement, making specific references to hundreds of cases which have been settled on the issue of coverage alone (p. 492). He also recommended specifically a general statute of limitations provisions and a general good faith provision (p. 493).

Wage and Hour Administrator: In the testimony of Mr. Walling, the Wage and Hour Administrator, the following statement occurs on page 557 of the record:

"The same type of retroactive liability involved in the present litigation involving working time can be created in connection with other terms in the act, apart from the portal-to-portal issue."

William C. Foster, Under Secretary in the Department of Commerce, recommended broad and general provisions as to settlement and as to the statute of limitations (p. 620).

In the Appendix printed as an official part of the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings, there are many letters and memoranda showing in great detail the scope of the emergency beyond the portal-to-portal situation and the great need for broad remedial provisions to take care of the existing emergency:

The American Retail Coal Association describes the problem facing that industry with regard to the problem of coverage and the retail exemption under the Fair Labor Standards Act (pp. 789–792).

The National Retail Farm Equipment Association (p. 807) and the National Retail Hardware Association (p. 808) and the National Lumber Dealers Association (p. 809) describe fully the serious problem which they face with regard to uncertainties under the retail and service establishment exemption. Each of them urges the adoption of good-faith provisions and statute-of-limitations provisions.

The National Sand and Gravel Association and the National Ready Mixed Concrete Association described the serious problem faced by them as a result of changed interpretations on coverage relating to the Interstate Commerce Commission exemption (pp. 810–811) and specifically advocated the broad provisions as to settlement, good faith, and statute of limitations contained in the original Capehart bill.

When we come to the House committee hearings, we find that actually there was as much specific testimony on the broader problems of retroactive liability generally as there was on the strict portal-to-portal situation.

References to specific testimony dealing with these broader problems and supporting wide provisions as to settlement and compromises, good faith, and statute of limitations in the House hearing record are as follows: Pages 7–10, Milton Smith, United States Chamber of Commerce; pages 61–63, W. R. Noble, National Retail Farm Equipment Association; pages 63–68, Joseph T. King, National Retail Lumber Dealers Association; pages 288–293, James L. Newbold, American Retail Coal Association; pages 293–303, Robert B. Beach, National Association of Building Owners and Managers; pages 346–351, Emil S. Neufeld, Garment Center Truck Owners Association; pages 352–353, American Farm Bureau Federation; pages 353–355, American Institute of Laundering; pages 359–380, Stanley I. Posner, National Industrial Laundry and Cleaners Association; pages 396–409, Almon E. Roth, National Federation of American Shipping; pages 409–412, Jack Garrett Scott, National Association of Motor Bus Operators; pages 412–418, William T. Jobe, National Association of Ice Industries; pages 423–429, 450–452, Raymond S. Smethurst, National Association of Manufacturers; pages 459–472, Roland Rice, American Trucking Associations; and pages 472–476, H. E. Foreman, Associated General Contractors of America.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, H. R. 2157, the bill presently under consideration, is generally referred to as the portal-to-portal bill, and I want to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee for their efforts in submitting the substitute bill with the provisions contained therein. I regret, however, that those provisions do not go as far as I think they should. In this I disagree with the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

I may add here that I shall support H. R. 2157 as it has come from the committee, because I feel that even though it does not go as far as I should like to have it go, I prefer it to the substitute bill offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN].

As a member of the Small Business Committee, I took an active interest in the passage of the Gwynne bill in the Seventy-ninth Congress. I did so because small business firms throughout the country, suddenly faced with huge alleged liabilities on many aspects of the wage-and-hour law, despite their reliance on various administrative rulings and interpretations, might have had relief in the adoption of the Gwynne bill. To a great extent this is denied them in H. R. 2157, as amended by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The Members of the Senate should understand that H. R. 2157, as it passed the House, includes all the measures included in the Gwynne bill, which was passed by both Houses of the Seventy-ninth Congress but was not enacted into law because of the adjournment of the Congress.

It is contended by some that we should support the Senate Judiciary substitute amendment, send the Senate bill to conference, and then the conferees will have the Senate version and the Gwynne bill passed by the House before them for consideration. I refer to the Gwynne bill which passed the House in the Eightieth Congress. We will have that bill and the Senate Judiciary Committee bill before us for consideration.

However, unless we offer specific suggestions or amendments the Senate conferees might not be familiar with the position of some Members of the Senate as to what its action should be in conference and especially is that true in the relief that the small businessmen are asking throughout the country.

As I stated in my opening remarks, H. R. 2157 is generally referred to as the portal-to-portal bill. In fact, however, the proposed legislation goes further, in a broader sense, than just portal-to-portal legislation; and I think it should even go further than it does.

The title of the act is broad enough and reads:

An act to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts, to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Although the critical situation, which has arisen as a result of the flood of just strictly portal-to-portal suits, has captured the imagination of the country and the Congress, yet these so-called strictly portal-to-portal suits include only one of the major problems which have arisen in the administration of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and is not the only situation to which the pending bill is addressed.

For example, the employers of the country, and particularly the smaller employers, are faced with a tremendous number of actual and prospective suits involving other terms in the Fair Labor Standards Act, which have not yet been finally construed by the Administrator, and the courts.

These include the following: First, the regular rate of pay problem; second, the coverage problem; third, the exemption problem; fourth, the area of production problem; fifth, retail and service establishment problems; sixth, the executive and administrative exemption problem.

These are covered in H. R. 2157, as it passed the House, insofar as it would give protection to employers who have relied upon administrative rulings and interpretations.

Why are not these problems handled in the Senate substitute? I have been told that the portal-to-portal legislation should be kept within the strict sense of the immediate emergency, which has to do with cases involved by the decisions of the Supreme Court of which we are all aware. But let me point out that all these provisions were covered in H. R. 2157 insofar as that bill could provide protection for reliance on administrative rulings and interpretations, and the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee substitute also deals with the same problems, but only in part. It is my contention that the Senate Judiciary Committee should broaden the substitute to include all the problems that were handled in the Gwynne bill. I think they have a perfect right to do it, or that the Senate has a right to do it.

There is no doubt that there is agreement on the part of Congress that adequate legislation should be enacted dealing with the portal-to-portal problem.

In support of strictly portal-to-portal legislation, I should like to make a brief statement.

The terms "work" and "workweek" are used in the Fair Labor Standards Act, but when Congress passed this act in 1938 it did not define either of those terms.

This undoubtedly was for the very obvious reason that Congress did not feel it necessary to define these terms in the statute any more than it did a great many other terms used therein, but assumed that the terms would receive their common-sense, conventional meaning, the meaning which they had before the act was passed and which was understood by employers and employees who might be concerned in the application of the act. I think there is no doubt about that.

It was to be supposed that no Administrator would ever rule and no court would ever hold that because Congress did not define some term in the act it thereby indicated an intention that a term should be given some new meaning which had not theretofore been attached to it.

In the earlier cases arising under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and not involving portal-to-portal claims, the Supreme Court was very careful to protect contracts between employers and employees as to how the act should be applied.

For instance, in the case of Walling v. Belo Corporation (316 U. S. 624), decided in 1942, the Supreme Court had before it a case in which a small publisher and owner of a radio station had made contracts with his employees providing the basis on which they should be paid. The Administrator undertook to have these contracts set aside. The Supreme Court refused to set them aside, and in its decision upheld the contract arrangement, saying:

> When employer and employees have agreed upon an arrangement which has proven mutually satisfactory, we should not upset it and approve an inflexible and artificial interpretation of the act which finds no support in its text.

The Belo case was not a portal-to-portal case, but it does show that the Supreme Court took the position up to that time that contracts meant something and were to be observed and protected.

Then came the portal-to-portal cases. There were three of them, and they involved the question of what was meant by Congress when it used the word "work" in the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The first of these decisions was Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company v. Muscoda Local 123 (321 U. S. 590). This case involved iron-ore miners. It was decided in 1944, more than 6 years after the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The second case was the Jewell Ridge Coal Corporation v. United Mine Workers of America (325 U. S. 161), decided in May 1945, and involving coal miners.

The third of these decisions was the so-called Mount Clemens Pottery case (Anderson et al. v. Mount Clemens Pottery Co.), decided June 10, 1946.

In the iron ore case, the Supreme Court held for the first time that underground travel time of iron-ore miners was work under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and that the employers were required by the act to pay for all such travel time specifically, and in addition to any other compensation which the iron-ore miners may have received under their contract of employment.

In the Jewell Ridge Coal case the Court went a step further and held that coal miners were entitled to be paid specifically for all travel time from the entrances or portals of the mines to the face of the coal, at which latter places the productive work of the coal miners was to be performed. The Court reached this conclusion in the case, notwithstanding the fact that a collective bargaining contract between the parties specifically defined what was to be considered compensable work, and excluded the travel time to and from the portal by contract. The Court held that neither collective bargaining contracts nor custom could exclude such travel time from compensable work under the Fair Labor Standards Act. This was a 5-to-4 decision.

Finally, in 1946, the Court decided a third case, the Mount Clemens case, not involving underground travel time, but time spent by employees in a small industrial establishment in walking to work, on the employer's premises and in engaging in certain preliminary activities such as putting on aprons and overalls, removing shirts, taping or greasing arms, and so forth. The Court again by a 5-to-4 vote held that all time so spent was work within the meaning of the Fair Labor Standards Act; and this was true, as Justice Murphy stated in the majority opinion, regardless of contrary custom or contract.

These three decisions have completely distorted the congressional intent as the dissenting judges in those cases, as well as the judges in the lower courts, have forcibly pointed out. Thus, in the Tennessee Coal and Iron case, Mr. Justice Roberts, who was joined in his dissent by Chief Justice Stone, stated:

> The Fair Labor Standards Act was not intended by Congress to turn into work that which was not work, or not so understood to be, at the time of its passage. It was not intended to permit courts to designate as work some activity of an employee, which neither employer nor employee had ever regarded as work.

Justices Roberts and Stone characterized the Court's decision in this case by quoting the words of Judge Sibley, who had dissented in the circuit court of appeals—

> The injustice of * * * is shocking.

These three decisions, and particularly the decision in the Mount Clemens Pottery case, have had disastrous results. The Fair Labor Standards Act was passed by Congress for two specific purposes:

The first was to require employers to pay employees a decent minimum wage for their work.

I certainly am in total agreement with that provision.

The second purpose was to discourage excessive hours of work by requiring employers to pay overtime after 40 hours of work in any one workweek.

The Congress obviously intended that the question of what was work was to remain exactly as it was before the act was passed, and merely to require that such work be compensated in accordance with the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the act.

It was not intended, and there is not one line in the act which indicates that Congress intended to require something to be paid for as work, which was not considered work, by the persons who performed it, or the person for whom it was performed.

It was naturally assumed, and I think rightly so, that where a man worked on a job, the hourly wage, or the piece rate, or the weekly wage, or the monthly salary, or any other basis of compensation agreed upon between the parties, or established by custom or practice, would take into account all of the incidental hardships and burdens which might be involved in that particular job. There is not one line of congressional history that I can find to support a finding of a contrary intention on the part of Congress when it passed the act in 1938.

The net effect of the portal-to-portal decisions of the Supreme Court has been to pervert the act from an instrument of righteous correction into an instrument to destroy those very employers who have attempted conscientiously to obey the mandates of the act.

As one of the witnesses before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee which held hearings on the pending bill pointed out, there is grim irony in the fact that the higher the wages paid by the particular employer, the more oppressive are the provisions of the act, as they have been interpreted by the Supreme Court in these portal-to-portal cases, because the overtime rate is pyramided on the regular hourly or piece rate.

I come now to the difference between the House bill and the Senate committee substitute in their treatment of portal-to-portal claims.

The House bill simply provides that there shall be no liability for so-called portal-to-portal activities in the past or the future, except where such activities are required to be paid for, either by contract or custom or practice. I think that is a short, positive statement of what the bill provides—and it provides it all the way around the clock.

The Senate bill takes care of the portal-to-portal problem as to the past, but it does not fully take care of the problem for the future. It deals only with portal-to-portal activities before the beginning of the working day and after the end of the workday. It does not settle the problems with reference to activities which occur between whistle and whistle.

Thus, the Senate committee amendment leaves untouched and, thus, subject to further administrative interpretations, court rulings, and labor disputes, all the questions as to liability for employee activities during the workday, such as (1) clothes changing, (2) wash-up time, (3) rest periods, (4) lunch periods, (5) instruction periods, and (6) many other activities common to industrial employment. This bill does not touch those.

I am unable to see why the same rule should not be written into law for the future as for the past. If certain activities, which have already occurred should not be paid for except where contract, custom, or practice requires it, then it seems to me that those same activities should not be under the Fair Labor Standards Act if they occur in the future except where the employer is obligated to pay for them by contract, custom, or practice.

The House bill accomplishes this object, the Senate amendment does not.

Objection will undoubtedly be made to the so-called retroactive features of this legislation as embodied in section 2 of the pending Senate version of the bill. Fair analysis of this criticism shows that it is without foundation. This legislation is not designed to impose a retroactive burden on anyone. It is rather designed to relieve employers of a retroactive burden which was imposed upon them by the three Supreme Court decisions rendered years after the original acts had become effective; and requiring retroactive payments with respect to activities which neither the employers nor their employees considered compensable under the law at the time the activities were engaged in.

It is a simple act of justice necessary for the Congress to perform in order to keep faith with that great majority of employers who relied and were entitled to rely in good faith upon the statute as it was originally written by the Congress.

If we fail to provide this relief we are thus allowing the imposition of a vast retroactive liability which ought not to exist and which in good conscience, should not be imposed upon the employers of the country.

It is not merely to relieve employers, however, that it is necessary for the Congress to pass this legislation. As so ably stated in the findings and policy of section 1 of the pending bill, this legislation is necessary in order to protect the public revenue, to further the national defense, and to protect, foster, and promote the very commerce which the original Fair Labor Standards Act was designed to promote.

Nor is there any doubt whatever as to the validity of the provisions of the pending legislation relating to existing portal-to-portal claims. The overwhelming weight of authority upholds the constitutionality of such remedial or curative legislation.

It is unnecessary for me to cite the numerous cases which have been called to the attention of the Judiciary Committee during the hearings which it has held on the pending bill, and which support beyond question the validity of this feature of the legislation.

The committee has called attention to several of the leading decisions in the report which it has filed with this bill—Senate committee Report No. 48, pages 43, 44. Briefs from some of the leading lawyers of the country have been filed with the Judiciary Committee in support of the validity of this legislation. It is difficult to see how any serious constitutional questions could be involved in what is now proposed, and particularly is this true in the light of the record which has been so ably put together by the subcommittee; and which is so amply reflected in the findings and policy of section 1 of the Senate bill.

For these reasons, it seems to me that the Judiciary Committee should have provided in the future on all strictly portal-to-portal suits, the same relief that they provided in the past.

But, Mr. President, as I have already stated, the pending bill does not deal merely with strictly portal-to-portal problems. It is true that the portal-to-portal problem is the most spectacular immediate problem, with which the committee substitute deals.

But, it is only one phase of a much more basic problem which grows out of the administration of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and the two other measures, the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act which I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, and which are embraced within the scope of the pending Senate substitute.

The only difference, as I have stated before, is that the House bill recognizes and deals adequately with a few of these other problems while the Senate substitute bill does not go that far.

The House bill recognizes and deals adequately with the following problems:

First. The House bill protects those employers who have acted in good faith in reliance upon decisions of the courts or administrative regulations, orders, rulings, interpretations, approvals, enforcement policies, or practices. There is no doubt about that.

Second. The House bill provides a 1-year statute of limitations upon the bringing of actions for the recovery of wages, overtime compensation, penalties, or damages, pursuant to any of the three statutes with which we are dealing.

Third. The House bill provides that any claim, cause of action, or action under any of these three acts, may be compromised, adjusted, settled, or released, in whole or in part, and that any such compromise, settlement, or release, in the absence of fraud or duress, shall be a complete satisfaction of such claim and a complete bar to any action based on such claim. It also validates any compromise, adjustment, settlement, or release, heretofore so made or given.

Fourth. The House bill provides that there shall be no award of so-called liquidated damages under any of the three acts mentioned, except in those cases where the court finds that the violation of the law giving rise to such action was in bad faith, and without reasonable grounds.

Mr. President, in addition to the suggestion which I have made that the Senate bill should deal with future portal-to-portal activities in the same way it deals with past activities, there are two other matters which I think should be called to the attention of the Senate.

These are:

First. The so-called settlement or compromise provision of the legislation, and Second. The so-called good faith reliance section.

On both of these provisions, the House bill is adequate. It provides that good-faith compromises and settlements of all claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, and the Bacon-Davis Act can be made at any time either as to past claims or as to future claims.

The Senate substitute deals with this settlement problem in a very limited way only. The settlement provision in the Senate substitute relates only to portal-to-portal claims, and then only to existing portal-to-portal claims. It does not permit settlement of other types of claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act or claims under the Walsh-Healy Act or Bacon-Davis Act, and it does not permit future settlements even of portal-to-portal claims, if I interpret the substitute correctly.

Some people may think that the House bill goes too far in permitting settlements in future of all types of claims arising under these three laws. I do not think so, but in any event the Senate provision is too narrow.

We should certainly permit the settlement of all past liability where the settlements are made in good faith. I can see no reason why we should not do so. The so-called good faith reliance feature of this legislation is undoubtedly the most important feature insofar as most business is concerned. This is particularly true of small business. The House bill gives protection to employers who have relied in good faith on administrative rulings, interpretations, and enforcement policies.

This protection is provided in the House bill, not only for the past but for the future. The Senate substitute does not take care of those who have acted in good faith in the past. It deals only with the future; and even as to future cases it is limited strictly to reliance on rulings of the Administrator, not of other administrative agencies. It would not protect those who may rely on rulings made by other than the Administrator. This is not so serious when we are dealing with the future because people will then be on notice that they cannot rely on rulings obtained from subordinate employees. Furthermore, they will have the protection in the future of a statute of limitations.

However, it is vitally important that we give protection now to those who have acted in the past in good-faith reliance on administrative rulings and interpretations.

Many thousands of small business enterprises, as well as the large industrial corporations, must comply with the statute. The annual report for the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Division for the fiscal year 1946 conservatively estimates that there are 550,000 establishments—more than half a million—whose employees are subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act. That is shown on page 25 of the report which I hold in my hand. The report also indicates that during the fiscal year 1946 the Division inspected 42,062 establishments to check compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act and with the Public Contracts Act; and that out of that number 28,167 employed 20 or less employees and 9,823 employed between 21 and 100 employees.

Of the total number inspected, only 4,072 employed more than 100 employees (p. 88, table F of the report). In other words, about 90 percent of those establishments inspected, employed 100 or less employees.

In that time, the Division found violations of one or both of those laws in 37,046 of those establishments, 85 percent of the total number inspected (p. 18 of the report).

It is inconceivable that the vast majority of employers have been willfully disregarding the Federal wage-and-hour laws. It is my conviction that those figures represent a tremendous number of inadvertent failures to comply with the statutes because of the inability of employers to determine what the law is, or what it was, or what somebody said it was, from the Administrator down.

I have already referred to the fact that there are many problems facing small business throughout the country, arising from the administration of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I want to give the Senate a few illustrations of these problems. I realize that we cannot deal with all of them in the present bill, but the cases I present will illustrate the confusion and administrative chaos which has existed under this law, for the past 8 years, and why it is necessary to protect the employers who have been caught between conflicting and changing administrative rulings and regulations.

The Fair Labor Standards Act covers any employee who is engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce, if, by its terms, he is not exempted. I think that is a fair interpretation of the law.

The statute further provides that an employee shall be deemed to be engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce if he is employed in "any process or occupation necessary to the production thereof in any State." The term "goods" is defined to include any part or ingredient thereof.

The Wage and Hour Division has utilized those provisions to extend the statute to employees whose relationship to the production of goods for interstate commerce is that of a third or fourth cousin, once removed. For example, it has ruled that the employees of an ink manufacturer who sells ink to a job printer in the same State who, in turn, uses the ink to print letterheads for a customer who mails them interstate are covered by the law, because the ink is an ingredient of the letterheads. Opinion of the Solicitor's Office, United States Department of Labor, release of February 8, 1945.

I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Missouri if he has heard of this case.

Mr. DONNELL. I have not heard of it. I thank the Senator from Nebraska for the information.

Mr. WHERRY. It also has been held that a fertilizer company which sells fertilizer to farmers in the same State must comply with the statute if the farmers' produce moves in interstate commerce—Solicitor's Office, release of February 8, 1945. That ruling, incidentally, rests upon a decision by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals holding an irrigation company furnishing water to farmers in the same State, to be under the statute because the carrots, lettuce, and cantaloupes grown by those farmers and shipped in interstate commerce had absorbed quantities of water, which thus became an ingredient of the goods sold in interstate commerce—Reynolds v. Salt River Valley Water Users Association (143 F. (2d) 863).

Who knows whether he comes under the law? Here is an irrigation company organized by a group of farmers who grow vegetables. They buy the irrigation water and they produce vegetables in the same State, but under the judicial opinion of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals they are classed as doing business interstate because the vegetables which absorb the water are finally shipped interstate for sale. How can anyone rely upon an interpretation? How does anyone know whether he comes under the Fair Labor Standards Act?

I could give other illustrations, including decisions by the United States Supreme Court which have extended the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to thousands of small local business and industrial enterprises which have had no reason to believe that the law was meant to apply to them, and who lack the money, personnel, and time to keep abreast of the rulings.

How can a small businessman employ counsel? It is said that he must be on guard. Certainly he must be on guard; but how does the small businessman know what the orders mean? How many small businessmen can afford to employ legal talent to inform them of their legal rights, regardless of whether the Administrator's order is in writing or not?

This question reaches down into the small homes and businesses that have made this country. Many of them are threatened because businessmen did not understand an interpretation, or were given to understand by the Administrator or some of his agents that they did not come under the Fair Labor Standards Act, when under a subsequent administrative order or the decision of some court, they were brought under the terms of the act.

Section 7 of the Fair Labor Standards Act provides that for all hours of work in excess of 40 in any workweek an employee must be paid not less than one and one-half times his "regular rate of pay." In September 1941, the Wage and Hour Administrator ruled that where the payment and amount of a bonus are solely in the discretion of an employer, that bonus need not be regarded as part of the employee's "regular rate of pay," stating:

> This type of bonus is illustrated by the employer who pays his employees a share of the profits of his business or a lump sum at Christmas without previously having promised, agreed or arranged to pay such a bonus. (Release R–1548, September 2, 1941.)

In his release A–13, dated February 5, 1945, the Wage-Hour Administrator repeated that ruling.

There is nothing in those rulings to indicate that where a discretionary bonus is paid regularly it becomes part of the regular rate of pay under the Fair Labor Standards Act. However, in two recent cases before the Second Circuit Court of Appeals the Wage and Hour Administrator, as plaintiff, successfully made that very contention. Those cases are Walling v. Richmond Screw Anchor Co. (9 WHR, 237), decided March 8, 1946, and Walling v. Garlock Packing Co. (6 WHR cases 538), decided January 16, 1937. Thus, by asserting in litigation a position clearly at variance with his public releases, the Administrator has placed numerous employers who voluntarily have been giving bonuses to their employees in jeopardy of substantial retroactive liability, which they had no reason even to contemplate.

They even asked the opinion of the Administrator as to whether they could do it or not, and he said they could. Now they find themselves under this imposed liability, after having acted in good faith in paying their employees a bonus.

Another aspect of the problem with which I feel we must deal may be illustrated by reference to the manner in which the Wage and Hour Division has construed the statutory exemption for service establishments. Section 13 of the statute exempts "any employee engaged in a retail or service establishment the greater part of whose selling or servicing is in intrastate commerce."

Immediately following the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Wage and Hour Administrator, in Interpretative Bulletin No. 6, informed intrastate industry that a service establishment was exempt from the law if the major portion of its total servicing was intrastate. A commercial laundry which delivered one-half or more of its laundry to persons intrastate would be considered as an intrastate firm, and as not coming under the provisions of the act. However, on June 6, 1941, when dealing with small local commercial and family laundries, the Administrator revised that ruling and divided laundries into two categories. He ruled that a commercial laundry, meaning one which does 25 percent or more commercial work for hotels, restaurants, and so forth, is not a service establishment within the meaning of the statute, but that a retail laundry, namely, one doing less than 25 percent commercial work, is entitled to the exemption conferred by section 13. In other words, instead of basing his ruling on the greater part of the laundry, he ruled that a laundry must do less than 25-percent commercial work, or business with hotels, restaurants, and other establishments, to be entitled to exemption from the law.

In 1943, subsequent to that ruling, one of the circuit courts of appeal held adversely to the Administrator's construction, and he suspended enforcement activities under his ruling. However, in 1946 the United States Supreme Court handed down two decisions holding that a service establishment is not entitled to the exemption conferred by section 13 unless it is a retail service establishment, namely, one primarily engaged in servicing ultimate consumers as distinguished from commercial customers—Roland Electric Company v. Walling (90 Lawyers Ed., U. S. Supreme Court Repts., p. 326, decided Jan. 28, 1946); Martino v. Michigan Window Cleaning Co. (90 Lawyers' Ed., U. S. Supreme Court Repts., p. 386, decided Feb. 4, 1946).

As a result of these decisions, the Wage and Hour Administrator has revived his distinction between retail and commercial service establishments and the laundry and dry-cleaning industries, as well as thousands of other small local service enterprises—retailers, wholesalers, hotels, restaurants, bakeries, ice plants, warehouses, barber shops, beauty parlors, funeral directors, and so forth, are faced with the prospects of retroactive liability to their employees in an amount which might be financially disastrous.

Two other United States Supreme Court decisions are extremely interesting.

One of these is Mabee against White Plains Publishing Co. In this case employees of a local newspaper publisher which had a total circulation of 9,000 to 11,000 copies daily were held to be under the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act because 45 copies of the newspaper were sent interstate. Think of it. A little newspaper which printed 11,000 copies was made subject to the provisions of the law, because 45 copies were mailed interstate.

This case was decided February 11, 1946, and is reported in volume 90, Lawyers' Edition, United States Supreme Court Reports, page 455.

The second of these cases decided by the United States Supreme Court is Martino against Michigan Window Cleaning Company. In this case window washers employed by a local window cleaning company doing a wholly intrastate business were held to be covered by the Federal law because they cleaned the windows of buildings occupied by companies producing goods for shipment in interstate commerce.

This case was decided on February 4, 1946, and is reported in volume 90, Lawyers' Edition, United States Supreme Court Reports, page 386.

It is unnecessary for me to appraise these decisions of the Supreme Court. The fact I want to emphasize is that the laundry industry, because of the Wage and Hour Administrator's inability to apply the exemption authoritatively, until Supreme Court clarification, now faces harsh and unfair retroactive liability, despite its adherence to the policies and practices of the Wage and Hour Administrator.

I could continue reciting illustrations of the manner in which the various provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act have been so interpreted and construed as to create uncertainty and confusion.

However, our immediate problem as I see it is to protect the thousands of employers who act in good faith against the disastrous financial liability which may be imposed upon them by the shifting and conflicting administrative and judicial interpretations of the statute. It is imperative that we protect those employers who make a bona fide attempt to comply with the numerous administrative rulings and judicial decisions until such time as we can revise the statute.

We must protect them not only from liquidated damages for criminal liability, but we must protect them so far as minimum wages and overtime wages are concerned, if they acted in good faith.

As a practical matter, the substance of the Wage and Hour Law now may not be determined from the language of the statute. It may be found, if at all, only by the intricate process of sifting through the numerous administrative rulings and court decisions. Employers generally, and particularly small ones, do not have the legal staffs and facilities necessary to analyze the continuously increasing mass of administrative and judicial decisions—which is the only method by which any employer can attempt to estimate what the Fair Labor Standards Act requires of him.

It would be manifestly unfair to leave employers in their present hazardous predicament until such time as we can completely examine the operation of the Fair Labor Standards Act and enact such legislation as may be necessary to prevent a continuation of the confusion which has resulted from administrative and judicial interpretations.

Until that time it is imperative that we enact the legislation necessary to protect employers attempting in good faith to comply with the law against the harsh retroactive penalties which now exist. Uncertainty is a cardinal vice in the law, and the present uncertainty in regard to the Fair Labor Standards Act exists in large measure because of the legislative activities of the Wage-Hour Division and the United States Supreme Court.

The many thousands of employers who must operate in conformity to the Fair Labor Standards Act should not be penalized because the Wage-Hour Administrator and the courts find the statute difficult to understand, or, as has happened in many cases, first take one position and then the opposite, leaving employers to act in unavoidable peril of vast retroactive liability.

As I stated in the beginning of my remarks, I think this bill does not go quite far enough, but I deeply appreciate the fact that with respect to one section which I think is most important to businessmen throughout the country, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary has at least given partial relief by considering the amendment which I propose. As I understand the parliamentary situation, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary will accept the amendment when and if the committee approves it. At that time the bill will be so amended. If not, the only other method of procedure is to offer the amendment on the floor of the Senate.

CONTINUATION OF ALLOCATION AND EXPORT CONTROLS

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate a matter that is of tremendous importance to our economy here at home and to the conduct of our foreign affairs. I refer to the need for extending, beyond March 31 of this year, certain controls under title 3 of the Second War Powers Act.

This is the authority under which all domestic allocations of scarce commodities, including food, and import controls are handled.

According to the Under Secretary of Agriculture, N. E. Dodd:

> Without such controls, imports of certain important commodities would rise, and the discrepancy between per capita food consumption in the United States and in food-deficit countries would widen.
> This could increase the ultimate direct drain upon United States resources in meeting minimum relief needs of other peoples.

Closely allied with this authority is the one pertaining to regulation of exports under the Export Control Act, which expires on June 30, 1947.

To assure equitable distribution of exportable supplies, to protect our domestic consumers against rising prices, and to make orderly and efficient use of our limited transportation and port facilities, the program of export controls through allocations must be continued.

These export and import control programs are based upon our participation in the International Emergency Food Council, which replaced the Combined Food Board on July 1, 1946.

In the operation of the Council, the participating countries agree to allocate commodities, particularly those in short supply, on a basis of need.

While the Council itself has no mandatory powers, once its allocation recommendations are agreed to by member nations the separate nations then implement those recommendations by import and export controls and in certain cases by means of domestic regulations.

The net effect of this system is to provide for fair distribution of commodities and supplies to countries on a basis of absolute need.

To permit these controls, involving export and import operations, to expire would in effect nullify our participation in the International Emergency Food Council.

This would open up a competitive system of operations, with the richer countries getting the best of the deal.

On the surface this might appear to be to our advantage, but on closer examination the facts do not bear out this assumption.

In the agricultural field, the commodities involved include grain and grain products, rice, sugar, edible molasses and syrups, inedible molasses, fats and oils, sugar-containing products, meat and meat products, and dairy products.

I shall not take the time now to discuss all of these products, but I should like to refer to the situation in respect to grain.

The disparity between exportable supplies and import supplies is becoming wider and wider.

Even in the face of the allocations program now being carried out to effect a careful distribution and an orderly movement of supplies in export trade, wheat prices in this country have advanced more than 50 cents a bushel within the past two months, and at present they are the highest in 30 years and may reach an all-time record.

The lifting of allocations control over exports would not only spell disaster to the people of importing countries whose economies have been shattered by the war, but would have most serious consequences with regard to our own economy.

There would be competitive bidding and contracting for available supplies, and prices would rise sharply, imposing added privations upon the countries in most urgent need of help, while setting in motion inflationary price spirals in our own country, where a steady rise in living costs is already causing grave concern.

While such price increases might benefit some speculators, they would not greatly benefit our agricultural producers, because the major portion of our grain crops which are sold off farms has already moved into trade channels, and also because of inflationary production costs.

In that connection, Mr. President, it is interesting to note that the report issued yesterday indicates that during the past year, while the farmer's income increased approximately 25 percent, his net income dropped from that of the previous year because his costs of production were greater, and now about 18 percent of all the wheat produced in this country remains in the hands of the farmers themselves.

Moreover, without an allocation program, our obligation to supply the Army and the occupied areas with food would be most difficult to carry out.

In addition, competitive contracting for shipment of grain from this country would completely disorganize our transportation system, which already is being taxed to the limit.

The allocation authority is necessary to insure that existing transportation facilities are put to the most essential uses, including the movement of grain and other materials to ports for shipment to suffering countries.

Mr. President, we are facing grave world problems. In the meantime the Congress is spending its time on what promises to be long-drawn-out labor legislation, which is not now so pressing that we cannot take the time to consider the matter of extending title 3 of the War Powers Act and the Export Control Act.

Failure to do this will have the effect of plunging our foreign affairs into a tailspin.

We cannot talk political cooperation and practice economic colonialism at the same time.

Extending these powers will have as great an effect on our foreign affairs and the promotion of friendship among nations as will the sending of millions of dollars to Greece and Turkey, and perhaps a greater effect than if we were to mobilize and dispatch an Army of a million men to those diplomatic outposts.

Mr. President, I hope we may not become so engrossed with other business as to neglect this gravely important matter of extending certain controls provided under title 3 of the Second War Powers Act and the Export Control Act, the first of which expires March 31, 1947, less than 2 weeks from today.

Permitting title 3 of the Second War Powers Act to lapse on March 31 would seriously hamper the effectiveness of the Export Control Act, even though that act would not officially die until June 30.

Failure to act to extend both import and export controls has undoubtedly been a major factor in the recent wave of speculation in the commodity market.

If we now fail to act promptly we may expect further drastic increases in commodity prices both at home and abroad, with the result that not only wil distribution of food to needy countries be disrupted, but there will be further discontent among wage earners at home because of a sharply increased cost of living.

In the interest of a stable economy both here and overseas, we should extend the import and export controls without delay, even if such a move necessitates postponement of our action on the unfinished business.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I wish to state my complete disagreement with the view of the Senator from Vermont with respect to the extension of the Second War Powers Act. Undoubtedly some controls which are provided for under the Second War Powers Act have to be extended. I understand there is now on the calendar a bill to extend the power over sugar, including the rationing of sugar. That bill is of tremendous importance to the American people. There is also a bill to extend rubber control, which is involved very definitely in the preservation of the synthetic-rubber industry. There may be a few other scarce commodities, the purchase of which abroad it may be desirable for the Government to continue in order to protect ourselves against monopoly, as in the case of quinine and one or two other commodities. But it seems to me most unwise to continue allocation controls over grain and fats and oils and a great variety of other commodities which, in general, today have a free market in the United States, and against which no price control whatever is operating. I refer to commodities as to which there is no reason that I can see why the Government should exercise the peculiar power of allocating them to American producers and American users or requiring rationing, in effect, or a continuation of rationing of various commodities which now are available throughout the world, and in respect to most of which there is a free market throughout the world.

The question of export controls is, to my mind, a different one. Export controls may be necessary because shortages of various commodities exist in the United States. There is no particular reason why we should not limit the amount of exports, so as to retain a sufficient quantity of such commodities to maintain the ordinary consumption of them in the United States. However, the Export Control Act is not connected with the Second War Powers Act. It operates by itself. It does not expire until the 30th of June. Before that time I think we may well consider the question whether it should be extended.

But I can see no reason for the extension of the powers with respect to fats and oils, for instance. The fats and oils situation is attempted to be controlled today by a world cartel, in effect—the very kind of control against which our foreign policy has been directed. It is based on exclusive Government buying of certain commodities. It imposes a world-wide control which is contrary, as I see it, to the entire foreign policy our Government is presenting at Geneva in connection with the various reciprocal trade agreements.

The proposal for the continuation of these controls is, to my mind, largely based on the idea of continuing something which can be turned into a permanent cartel for the control of materials, such as is advocated by many persons in the International Food Organization and various other organizations which are developing policies which I think are in complete opposition to the policies of our Government.

Mr. President, there is no reason to continue controls under which the price of wheat has reached nearly $3. If such control can be effective in respect to controlling the price of wheat, certainly it should have been used in a more effective way than it has been used. It is a perfectly futile thing, I think, except to give Government agencies the right to interfere in a certain number of important industries. So I think the sooner we go back to the former situation the better.

The President recommended the continuation of the war powers, but we remember that when we inquired from the President with regard to the possibility of the termination of hostilities, one week he wrote back to us that there were many controls which would have to be continued and that he would have to make studies in regard to them, but another week he suddenly terminated the controls and wiped off the statute books 100 statutes which he previously had said could not safely be removed.

Of course, I may be mistaken as to one or two commodities. We have admitted that we should continue controls on sugar and a few other of the scarce commodities, such as tin, antimony, and quinine; and perhaps there are some others. Perhaps something is to be said for fats and oils; but I think it would be a serious mistake to contemplate any extension of the powers of the President under the Second War Powers Act.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Ohio does not agree with me as to the desirability of continuing allocation controls and export controls. But in spite of what he says, I think the continuation of controls over fats and oils and grain is of particular importance, not only to our domestic economy, but to peace and to the stabilization of the economy of the entire world, as well. Today there is a world-wide shortage of fats and oils, and it is an acute shortage. Today there is also a world-wide shortage of grains.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment, to permit me to make a further statement about fats and oils?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I thank the Senator.

The fact is that fats and oils are largely produced in the English and Belgian territories, and those countries are deliberately holding the price of fats and oils far below the price in the United States. By means of such government control they are choking the production of those oils. Until we wipe out the international agreement which permits them to do that, there will not be any increase in the production of fats and oils in those districts.

There is nothing peculiar in the world today about fats and oils. They can be produced just as freely as they could be before the war, if we once remove the restrictions which now are preventing their production.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, if we remove the restrictions on them today, I think we simply open the gates for the rich corporations to monopolize the production of fats and oils. If we take off the controls today or if we permit them to lapse on the 31st of this month, I think many dealers, speculators, and corporations that trade in fats and oils will become immensely wealthy, while the poor people of the other countries of the world, who today are hungry and famine-stricken and almost ready to embrace communism, will become hungrier and in poorer health and more willing to embrace communism.

I do not believe that $400,000,000 put into Greece and Turkey or 400,000 men put into Greece and Turkey with arms could offset the damage which would be done by letting these allocation and export controls lapse.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with what the Senator from Vermont has said with respect to the extension of this particular act, as he has suggested. The evidence before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of which the Senator is a member, shows that there is only one reason for the continuation of these controls; namely, to assure an equitable distribution throughout the world to nations which would not get the proper quantities of fats and oils and grains, if there were no controls of this type.

As the Senator well said, those in this country who buy and sell grains would not be looking after the interests of those who are in dire need in Poland, Belgium, Yugoslavia, Greece, or some other nation which particularly needs grains and fats and oils. They would not have the facilities or the means with which to do it. The only way it can be done is through this international organization, by pooling the resources, and making an equitable distribution, as is so vitally necessary if these people are to continue to get their fair share of the things of life which will keep them from starving, or at least keep them from becoming overwhelmed by misery and despair.

I wish to say that the President of the United States does not want controls continued over these commodities any longer than does anyone else. It is merely a question of good business, as I see it, and not only good business, but a question of giving to the countries of the world which are in dire need a fair and equitable proportion of the necessities of life.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I agree generally with what the Senator from Illinois has said. I wish to add that with the world in the condition in which it is today this is no time at all for the United States to withdraw from participation in the International Emergency Food Council, if we are to oppose the forces of totalitarianism which are crowding into the small, famine-stricken countries. We have to oppose such forces with food. That is the most potent weapon we can use today.

I wish to repeat, the time is getting short. There are only a few days more in which we may extend these controls. I think it is common knowledge that speculators have been pyramiding the prices of commodities in the United States, with the expectation that they will be able in some way to prevent the continuation of the controls.

The price of wheat had risen 50 cents a bushel, I think, up to yesterday, it rose 10 cents a bushel yesterday, and is still rising. The farmer is not getting that increase, because he has sold his wheat. It is the speculators who are benefiting from the rise. The price will continue to rise. There will be an increase in the cost of living in the United States, there will be an increase in the cost of living in the famine-stricken countries of Europe and Asia. We cannot afford to let that happen; we cannot afford to let the people go hungry. We are not hungry here. We do not have everything we want, but we certainly have more than do the people in any other country of the world.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. The Senator also is aware of the fact that there are certain other controls which might be mentioned. In recent hearings in the Judiciary Committee it developed that we are unable to get certain necessary articles for our own production in which we are in very short supply. Frequently we are able to procure them through the International Control System. For instance, hemp for binding twine is in extremely short supply, and it is only through allocations that we can get a sufficient quantity to operate the harvesting machines and get the grain. The drug companies producing quinine came to this hearing insisting that controls be continued in order that we might get quinine and cinchona bark so necessary for the treatment of malarial diseases in this country.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I wish to say only one thing further with relation to the war controls. In the first place, I personally have no objection to continuing the controls in the case of a scarce commodity produced in some other country, when the removal of controls will not raise the price to us so that we have to pay the entire cost and someone else gets the benefit. That is the basis of the rubber buying.

What does the administration say about that? It says, "We will not continue exclusive buying of rubber by the Government," although the industry wishes that it be done. "We shall continue the allocation." How they can continue the allocation of rubber after abandoning exclusive Government buying I do not know. But in any event, I have no particular objection, in principle, to continuing the controls. That applies to tin, antimony, cinchona bark—which is a Dutch-Government monopoly, referred to by the Senator from West Virginia.

On the other hand, when it comes to the question of wheat and fats, I do not see that the controls do anything except permit the Government to interfere in the operation of the distribution of the commodities. They have not held the price down, and the only way I know of to hold down the price is by retaining export controls. By letting the act expire export controls are not removed. We can say that we will not permit more than 300,000,000 bushels of wheat to go out of the United States. We can put whatever limit we want on the export of automobiles and trucks, under the Export Control Act. But I have seen no reasonable explanation of the necessity for our continuing the attempted allocation of commodities which are produced to a large extent in the United States.

RUMORED STRIKE BY TELEPHONE WORKERS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to take only a moment or two to make a comment and a suggestion in regard to the rumored Nation-wide telephone strike which the newspapers tell us is scheduled for April 7.

I desire to say, that even the rumor of such a strike does not make sense, and I think the parties to the dispute should reflect on the fact that the American people will not and should not have very much patience with a Nation-wide telephone strike on April 7.

I think the parties to the negotiations have an obligation to proceed in good faith collective bargaining from now until April 7, in an effort to iron out the differences between them. Certainly no strike is necessary to educate the American people to an understanding that there is difficulty with the telephone industry, and certainly no shut-down of the telephones on April 7 will advance one particle the interests of the workers in that industry.

I think their leaders should know, and the operators of the telephone system should know, what the area of disagreement between the parties is at the present time. I think they also should know that we, the public, fully understand that if the workers strike, when the parties come finally to settling the dispute, it will be settled pretty much on the basis of the same terms on which it could be settled and should be settled prior to April 7.

I am one who believes that it is important to retain the right to strike, because sometimes, as I said last Monday, strikes are necessary to inform the public as to the merits of a given dispute. But that certainly is not true in this instance.

Therefore, Mr. President, as one who is a firm believer in the voluntary processes and the peaceful procedures for the settlement of labor disputes, I sincerely hope that the parties to this labor dispute will have the good sense, and, may I say, the common sense, to adopt voluntarily peaceful procedures for the settlement of the dispute, without visiting upon the American people the tremendous economic disruptions which would result from a telephone strike on April 7.

It is not for me to pass on the merits of the dispute, and I do not propose on this occasion to do so. I think, however, I know a little something about the merits of the dispute and the issues which are at stake. I know that there is not a single issue involved in the dispute between these disputants which cannot be settled by peaceful procedures, and which in fact should not be settled between now and April 7 by good-faith collective bargaining. But if they cannot get together by good-faith collective bargaining between now and April 7, I want to suggest to them here and now—and I think the great majority of the American people will totally agree with my suggestion—that in this great time of stress and strain in America, they owe it to themselves to demonstrate that they are willing to stand by and measure up to the voluntary procedures of collective bargaining, mediation, conciliation, and arbitration, about which leaders of industry and labor talk so much but so frequently, on both sides, do not practice.

Therefore, I not only make the suggestion, but I do more, Mr. President, than make the suggestion, for, as one Member of this body, in good faith and in deep sincerity, I call upon the parties to this dispute to demonstrate their faith in our voluntary system by notifying the American people now that if they cannot get together by way of collective bargaining between now and April 7 there will be no strike; they will agree between themselves to ask for voluntary arbitration for the settlement of all the issues which may be pending between them on April 7 prior to that date if they have not been able to settle them.

I suggest further that to show their good faith the parties to the dispute also announce their willingness to have a responsible public official, such as the ones whom I shall suggest, empowered to select an arbitrator whose decision they will agree in advance shall be final and binding upon them. I have selected several names somewhat at random. I selected them because I believed that these men would see to it that an impartial arbiter or board of arbitration would be selected for the settlement of this dispute. The parties to the dispute need not select anyone from the list of names I am about to enumerate, but may choose anyone else they want to agree upon.

I suggest, nevertheless, Mr. President, that they agree on a responsible public official, such as the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Schwellenbach, or the Director of Conciliation, Mr. Warren, or Mr. John Steelman, one of the able administrative assistants to the President and one of the best-qualified labor-relations men in the United States, or the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Clark, or an ex-Justice of the United States Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Roberts, or someone else of high standing in the official life of America.

I make that suggestion, Mr. President, because I think the suggestion itself challenges the leaders of labor in the telephone industry and the leaders on the industry side of the table and puts it squarely up to them as to whether or not they really mean it when they say, as they have said publicly, that they believe in good-faith collective bargaining, and, as I understand, they also believe in peaceful procedures for the settlement of labor disputes.

As we in this Eightieth Congress are faced with the complex and difficult problems of labor legislation, with the myriad of suggestions which are being made to us for extreme legislation, I think certainly someone ought to raise his voice and say quite frankly to American labor and to American industry, both of whom, in my judgment, will be losers if extreme legislation is passed. The time has come, gentlemen, for you to show your good faith. Demonstrate to the American people that you will save them from the tremendous economic loss which would be sure to flow from "pulling the plug," so to speak, on April 7, and disrupting the telephone industry, by a strike. I repeat that, in my judgment, a strike is absolutely unnecessary and totally uncalled for if the leaders of the industry on both sides of the table will measure up to their public responsibility.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. It is manifest we cannot conclude action on the pending bill this evening, and unless the Senator from Michigan desires to proceed at this time——

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. In accordance with the plan which was announced last week, it is the intention to hold a session tomorrow and a session tomorrow night in the hope that by that time we may be able to finish action upon the portal-to-portal bill. I may say further that the session tomorrow is planned to continue right through without any recess. Members of the Senate will have to get their suppers when and if they can get them.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Garrison Norton, of New York, to be an Assistant Secretary of State; and David M. Maynard, of California, and sundry other persons for appointment as Foreign Service officers and secretaries in the diplomatic service.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. I see on the Executive Calendar a number of nominations. I think all of them with a single exception, are controversial, and there is general agreement that they should go over. There is, however, one nomination concerning which, so far as I am informed, there is no ground of complaint and no opposition. I therefore ask unanimous consent that, as in executive session, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the nomination of Edward Mount Webster to be a member of the Federal Communications Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the nomination.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Edward Mount Webster, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the Federal Communications Commission for the unexpired term of 7 years from July 1, 1942.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that the President may be notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be so notified.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, because of the desire of the majority leader to recess at this time, I ask unanimous consent that I may be recognized at the convening of the session of the Senate tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, before the request is put let me say that I hope the Senator from Michigan will be recognized on tomorrow, but I fear we are falling into a unanimous-consent habit of attempting to control who shall speak on the following day. Obviously such a unanimous-consent agreement cannot be binding under the rule. Who shall gain the floor tomorrow depends entirely on whom the Chair will recognize. I merely mention that because I have noticed that Senators have gradually been falling into the habit of making unanimous-consent requests of this character, and for the benefit of some new Members who may not know the rule I will say that this practice will not hold water if the rule is invoked. I sincerely hope the Senator from Michigan will gain the floor on tomorrow, and I am sure he will.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am familiar with the rule, and I will attempt on tomorrow to obtain the floor at the convening of the Senate.

RECESS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 19, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate March 18 (legislative day of February 19), 1947:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Edward Mount Webster to be a member of the Federal Communications Commission for the unexpired term of 7 years from July 1, 1942.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 18, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou who art at the right hand of our Father, we come to Thee as little children, for we know how imperfect we are. Abide with us each succeeding day; root and ground us in the unchangeable truth that right is on the side of this universe. Thou light of the faithful and master of all good workmen, sanctify to each one of us our kindred aims; lift our hearts above all failure and misunderstanding unto more perfect labor.

As Lord of all and yet servant of all, let Thy kingly truth permeate our souls, that we may be fortified with that wisdom which gives encouragement and which seals the public confidence. Within the range of our duty and the mastery of our powers, help us to find and discern Thee, and to keep before us these immortal injunctions: know thyself, control thyself, and give thyself. O America, be not disquieted within thee; hope thou in God, for we shall yet praise Him, who is the health of our countenance. Through Christ and in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 9. Concurrent resolution to print for the use of the Committee on Finance additional copies of Senate Report No. 610, Seventy-sixth Congress, entitled "Survey of Experience in Profit Sharing and Possibilities of Incentive Taxation."

LEGISLATIVE BUDGET

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the first issue of the Daily Digest was distributed this morning and I was particularly glad to have it as I have been wondering what has become of the budget resolution—House Concurrent Resolution 20.

As will be recalled, a Joint Committee on the Legislative Budget was appointed immediately after Congress convened. After passing through a long period of somnolence, it finally reported the concurrent resolution on February 15—the last day permissible under the law—now something more than a month ago.

The resolution was passed by both Houses and, following routine procedure, was eventually sent to conference—since which time it has not been heard of. All this is now ancient history but miles of headlines were written about it when it was the chief legislative topic in the press earlier in the session.

From the beginning, the futility of attempting to write a Federal budget without hearings and adequate data was generally recognized and on this side of the aisle we earnestly recommended postponement until definite information was available—and especially until the meeting of the Moscow Conference.

When the resolution came before the House we offered a motion to delay further action until April. It is gratifying to note that our counsel and advice has evidently been accepted and approved and that the resolution has been pigeonholed pending developments permitting intelligent action on a national budget.

Mr. Speaker, we commend this well-considered delay as timely and convincing evidence of real and constructive statesmanship. The only regret is that the delay was not agreed on at the time the resolution of postponement was offered as it would have saved a vast amount of time and greatly expedited the work of the Congress. The session is nearly half gone and only one annual appropriation bill has passed the House. The work of the House is further behind than ever before within the memory of any Member of Congress. The time and attention of the leadership of both Houses has been consumed in the consideration of a resolution which is, at best, merely advisory.

Actual retrenchment and economy can be achieved only through reduction of appropriations in the supply bills and the longer the bills are delayed the longer we must wait for factual data on which to base any proposal for reduction of taxes or curtailment of the national debt.

It is to be hoped the appropriation bills will be reported and passed as expeditiously as possible. On this side of the aisle we are ready and anxious to cooperate in cutting every reducible item to the bone. We hope to have that opportunity in the near future.

THE LATE EDGAR CLARENCE ELLIS

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound regret that I inform the House of the death last Saturday evening of the Honorable Edgar Clarence Ellis, who served during five terms as a Republican Member of this House, representing the old Fifth District of Missouri. Mr. Ellis was 92 years old. He is survived by his widow and three sons.

Mr. Ellis served in this body in the Fifty-ninth and Sixtieth Congresses, 1905–09; the Sixty-seventh Congress, 1921–23; the Sixty-ninth Congress 1925–27; and the Seventy-first Congress, 1929–31. His district included all of Jackson County, Mo., which has since been divided into the fourth and fifth districts. I have the privilege and honor of representing the Fifth District of Missouri, once ably and faithfully represented by this distinguished citizen of Kansas City.

There are few Members now in this House who will recall Mr. Ellis. Only one of the present members of the Missouri delegation, the Honorable CLARENCE CANNON, served with him here. He will be remembered for his towering stature in both physique and ability; for his keen understanding of the legislative problems of his day and his forthright approach to them; for his integrity and splendid qualities of character; and for the superb quality of metaphor and persuasion which characterized his extraordinary eloquence.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REEVES. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Being one of the few present Members who served with Mr. Ellis, and having known him quite well, I endorse what the gentleman has said. I call attention to the fact that Mr. Ellis had one quality most necessary to make a worthy and efficient Congressman: he had the courage of his convictions.

He was a real American in whom the elements were so mixed that "nature might stand up and say to all the world, 'This was a man.'"

Mr. REEVES. I thank the gentleman for that well-deserved tribute to the memory of our late colleague.

In the hard-fought campaign of last year Mr. Ellis appeared at Kansas City and spoke in my behalf. He was then 91 years of age, but his vigor was unimpaired, his mind was alert and clear, and he spoke with a fresh enthusiasm which was deeply stirring.

His life was rich and full, and ended suddenly, quietly, calmly, in the way which every man covets for himself.

So be my passing.
My task accomplished and the long day done,
My wages taken and in my heart
Some late lark's singing,
Let me be gathered to the quiet West
The sundown, splendid and serene.

Mr CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REEVES. I yield to my collegaue from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON. It was my privilege to serve with Edgar Ellis in the Sixty-ninth and Seventy-first Congresses. Due to the fact that he had previously served intermittently in the House, he was looked upon as one of the elder statesmen and all members of the delegation consulted with him on all important matters touching the interests of the State and our section of the Mississippi Valley.

He was particularly interested in the development of our waterways and exercised in many instances a determining influence on legislation before the House relating to interstate commerce and the development of national resources.

He was one of the kindliest men I have ever known and was always ready to step across party lines to do a favor or serve a mutual interest. His service in the Congress adds luster to the fame of his State and only his advancing age precluded his further participation in the activities of the forum which he so enjoyed and in which he attained such success. He passed on in the fullness of time—with the sun low on the horizon—and with the regard and affection of all those fortunate to be associated with him here on this floor.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF COMMUNISM IN ACTION

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 17) authorizing the printing of additional copies of House Document No. 754, Seventy-ninth Congress, entitled "Communism in Action," with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Line 2, strike out "500" and insert "425."
Line 7, strike out "125" and insert "50."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

OUTLAWING COMMUNISTS

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to oppose these amendments, but instead of cutting down the number of copies to be printed it seems to me the number should have been increased.

All real Americans have come to recognize at last that communism is the enemy of American institutions.

Time and time again we have shown on this floor that the leaders of the Communist Party have announced that what they propose to do is to destroy this Government and set up a Soviet government in its place; and the head of the Communist Party in this country, William Z. Foster, has said "that behind that government will stand the Red army to enforce the dictatorship of the proletariat."

Their members and former members—and remember, there are no former members except the ones who have been expelled from the Communist Party—are subjected to a terror that mankind has scarcely known in all history. If you doubt that, read Jan Valtin's Out of the Night. Just read the first few chapters.

In addition, they are out to destroy Christianity throughout the world and everything based on Christian principles.

They tell you they are for destroying the capitalist system. What do they mean by the capitalist system? They mean the right to own your home, your farm, your factory, or your store—the right to own private property. They mean to wipe out all of that and spread over America, and over every other country in the world, the horrible terrors that are now imposed upon the suffering people of Europe.

They prate about democracy. There is no more democracy in a Communist country today than there is in the penitentiary of Mississippi, New York, Texas, Connecticut, Georgia, or Iowa.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman think we should vote against concurrence in the Senate amendments?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I am not opposing the amendments.

On yesterday we had what someone has called a revival of righteousness in the Supreme Court. That august body decided that we had a right to knock every Communist off the Federal pay roll. I am in favor of beginning now and getting every one of them off the Federal pay roll without delay.

I saw in this morning's paper where a Red professor in Columbia University was attacking the Committee on Un-American Activities. His name is mentioned 22 times in the last report of the Dies committee.

They now invoke the Constitution and say it is unconstitutional to throw these enemies of America off the Federal pay roll. It reminds me of what Secretary Weeks told us once. He said that when the policemen in Boston went on strike, all the thugs went to breaking in and robbing stores, just taking the goods out by the armload. One of these looters undertook to take an armload of goods away from another one, and the other person instinctively yelled for the police.

So if these Reds, these Communists, these enemies of America who are poisoning the minds of your children through our educational institutions, and who are using the mails to spread their poison and hatred for America and everything based on constitutional government, if these enemies of America who are trying to undermine and destroy our economic system and enslave the American people now invoke the Constitution to protect them from justice at the hands of the American people, it is not going to work.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include as part of my remarks a bill which I have introduced to outlaw communism in America. It may need some minor amendments, but it is heading in the right direction.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

(The bill is as follows:)

Be it enacted etc.—

LEGISLATIVE FINDING AND DECLARATION

SECTION 1. The Congress hereby finds and declares that—

(1) attempts by Communist sympathizers to secure election to public office in the United States;

(2) the teaching of Communist views in public or private schools, colleges, or universities in the United States; and

(3) the sending of Communist literature through the United States mails, are un-American activities which constitute a dangerous threat to our Government, to our democratic institutions, and to the freedom and security of the people of the United States; and the enactment of this act is a necessary exercise of legislative power to protect and maintain our form of Government and the American way of life.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. As used in this act—

(1) The term "Communist Party" means the political party now known as the Communist Party of the United States of America, whether or not any change is hereafter made in such name.

(2) The term "publication" means any letter, writing, circular, post card, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, book, or other publication.

PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN ACTS

SEC. 3. (a) It shall be unlawful for an individual to file as a candidate for, or otherwise to attempt to secure election to, any Federal or State elective office (1) as the candidate of the Communist Party, or (2) if such individual is a member of the Communist Party.

(b) It shall be unlawful, in any course of instruction or teaching in any public or private school, college, or university, to advocate, or to express or convey the impression of sympathy with or approval of, communism or Communist ideology.

(c) It shall be unlawful to send or attempt to send through the United States mails any publication the whole or any part of which advocates, or the whole or any part of which expresses or conveys the impression of sympathy with or approval of, communism or Communist ideology.

PENALTY FOR VIOLATIONS

SEC. 4. Whoever violates any provision of section 3 (a), or willfully violates any provision of section (3) (b) or (c), of this act, shall upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that all the amendments do is to reduce the number of copies available for the Senate, but do not change the number available for the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELECTION TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 150), which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That JAMES C. DAVIS, of the State of Georgia, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the standing committee of the House of Representatives on the District of Columbia.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

AMENDING FEDERAL RESERVE ACT

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 148, Rept. No. 162) which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2413) to amend the Federal Reserve Act, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall not exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

DISTRIBUTION AND PRICE OF SUGAR

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 149, Rept. No. 163), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 146, to extend the powers and authorities under certain statutes with respect to the distribution and pricing of sugar, and for other purposes, and all points of order against the said joint resolution are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of any point of order the substitute amendment recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency now in the bill and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration the Committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON FISCAL AFFAIRS OF COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the members of the Subcommittee on Fiscal Affairs of the Committee on the District of Columbia be authorized to sit, notwithstanding the House may be in session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order I have for this afternoon may be canceled and that I may address the House for 30 minutes on Monday, following the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 1 hour today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'HARA asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two newspaper articles.

Mr. ROHRBAUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Chrisian Science Monitor advocating Federal support for public education.

Mr. SUNDSTROM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address delivered by George E. Stringfellow on Thomas Alva Edison.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and to include excerpts in each.

Mr. McDONOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two editorials.

Mrs. BOLTON asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include a letter which appeared in the public press.

TRANSSHIPMENT OF OUR WAR DEAD TO AMERICA

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, when this House authorized the transshipment to the United States of such of the bodies of our war dead as might be requested by their next of kin, I expressed on this floor the earnest hope that all possible effort be made to give a true picture to the bereaved families. I had just been in England and in France where I had seen the earnestness with which the graves registration units persisted in their identification efforts, and the tender reverence with which they performed their difficult and tragic task.

No country has gathered together all that was visible of its gallant dead as we have done. Nowhere in all the world is there such peace and beauty as in the American cemeteries, no matter where they are to be found.

Very recently the War Department sent out letters to the families of those whose loved ones lie in the consecrated soil of far-away lands asking what might be their desire in the matter. Soon after there was printed in many newspapers in this country a courageous and forthright letter written by Mrs. George S. Patton, Jr.

In it she says:

Will it comfort you to hear that your soldier is being shipped home in a box or an urn to be reburied? What will come home to you isn't what you love.

Will it ease your grief or make you happier to know that some young soldier, drafted to serve our country overseas, is digging up these poor bones?

Every good soldier I have ever known wanted to be buried where he fell. Mine did. Our dead have earned the right to rest in peace.

Mr. Speaker, that the House may have the full text of Mrs. Patton's letter, I have secured unanimous consent to include it in the extension of my remarks appearing in the Appendix of the RECORD.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, on the advice of the Parliamentarian, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2543) to repeal the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, which bill was introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], and that the same be rereferred to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNSON of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two letters.

Mr. COUDERT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article appearing in today's New York Times.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RAMEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. McDOWELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article from yesterday's Daily News by Tom Stokes.

Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the American Wool and Cotton Reporter with reference to the tariff.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. FORAND asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

GREEK RELIEF

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, a man of some distinction in this country once said that all he knew was what he read in the newspapers. I read in the Sunday paper that Willard Thorp, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, and Henry S. Villard, Deputy Director of the Department's Division of Near East and African Affairs, said in a broadcast that the United States would dispatch to Greece Federal Government specialists in agriculture, internal revenue, budget control, civil service, and public health, as well as highway transportation and bridge engineers.

I also read in the papers that Mr. Paul Porter is back. He has been over there at the head of the American Economic Mission. I just want to express the hope that Paul's return is not a signal for the calling of the clan, and I want to suggest that the committees dealing with these matters inquire and make sure that this is a relief program for Greece and not a relief program for some displaced OPA personnel.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

PAY OF SCHOOL TEACHERS

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, in the Pathfinder of March 12, it appears that Erskin Richmond, of Beckley, W. Va., is quitting his job as school principal to mine coal. He said:

I can make twice as much there as by teaching school.

The miner has always had a voice to speak for him. Orators and writers throughout the length and breadth of the land have always proclaimed the cause of "the man down in the bowels of the earth." They should. These men go into darkness that we may have light. Yet a man, underpaid, not recognized for his merits, being under great strain in the teaching profession, says, "I am going to the bowels of the earth and quit my teaching." With five times as much money spent for pleasure as for education, with three times as much spent for cosmetics as for education, and now a teacher leaving the profession and going to the bowels of the earth. Is that not a challenge for today?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

[Mr. PHILBIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address delivered by President Roxas in Manila, and also a clipping from one of the Manila papers.

Mr. CELLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks on two subjects.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two instances and in one to include a speech he made at Haverhill, Mass., on last Sunday.

Mr. HAVENNER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix and include a letter and a resolution.

Mr. GORDON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article from the Chicago Daily Times.

THE RIGHT TO FIRE COMMUNISTS FROM THE GOVERNMENT SERVICE

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, we often hear condemnation of the Supreme Court. Some of that condemnation, I believe, has been justified. Now we must, however, give praise where praise is due.

The Supreme Court on yesterday rendered a very praiseworthy decision when it gave the green light to a bureau of the Government, the Civil Service Commission, to demand the resignation or severance from service of anyone who is a Communist or a fellow traveler.

I hate communism and loathe all its works. The Civil Service Commission is a splendid vehicle whereby we can rid ourselves of Communists in the Federal service. It seems rather anomalous that a Communist should be allowed to remain in the service of the Government he seeks to overthrow. It is like befouling one's nest or biting the hand that feeds one. I am sure the Civil Service Commission will do its duty.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday three Members of the House addressed us on the subject of juvenile delinquency. I wish to take this opportunity to join them in their concern over that problem and to subscribe 100 percent to their statements.

I also desire to take this opportunity to point out that the Attorney General of the United States, the Honorable Tom Clark, recognized the seriousness of this problem a long time ago and therefore instituted a nation-wide program to combat juvenile delinquency. He has offered the local and State agencies which deal with juveniles the facilities of the FBI and the Department of Justice, and he reasons, as did the gentleman who spoke yesterday, that this problem of juvenile delinquency is one which must be met on a local level. In pursuance of that he has instigated the organization of over 100 boys' clubs and youth centers throughout the large cities of the United States. I think he is to be commended on his very fine work on this most serious problem.

PAY TERMINAL-LEAVE PAY IN CASH

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, on the opening day of Congress, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] introduced a bill in the House which would authorize the payment of terminal-leave pay in cash. When this bill failed to come out of the committee on March 4 of this year the gentleman from Florida put a petition on the Speaker's desk to bring it out of the committee. I do not know how many Republicans have signed it, but quite a number of Democrats have.

In the Washington Times-Herald of today I see that cash terminal-leave pay is now favored by the GOP in the House. I just want to make this observation, that if the GOP is now so anxious to pay this terminal-leave pay in cash, that petition is still on the Speaker's desk. Now if you favor this cash payment and want to do the right thing—you will walk up there and sign it, pay that obligation in cash and let credit fall where credit is due.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

WILL WONDERS NEVER CEASE!

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will wonders never cease! Here we have the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] praising the Supreme Court because it gave one branch of the Federal Government permission to throw the Reds out of office in another department. That really is something—the court has actually reached the conclusion that if an employee is disloyal he can be fired. The farmer and his hired man knew that years ago. Now, some of the Members who were not here during the last 10 years should get the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD covering that period and note how some of these same gentlemen who now speak against the Communists used to skin the Dies committee and vote against every appropriation for which it asked.

I repeat, will wonders never cease? Here is the Secretary of Labor, Judge Schwellenbach, coming before the Committee on Labor and suggesting that the Congress outlaw communism and the Communists. Well, it was not so long ago since he sent a telegram to a Communist front organization—the International Labor Defense organization—congratulating it and sending greetings. Here is former Senator LaFollette writing an article for a magazine with a national circulation condemning the Communists. Well do I remember the old Senate Civil Liberties Committee, which used to attack everyone who opposed the Communist-directed CIO or said a word against them.

Will wonders never cease? Has the time, at last, come when one who speaks for America first is going to be permitted to talk without being sent to jail? Without being smeared? I wonder! Oh, what a difference the results of the November 1946 election made in the talk of certain folks. I wonder if it will have a like effect on their actions?

POLITICS OF EMERGENCIES

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the politics of the past 15 years have become famous as the politics of emergencies. Roosevelt had dozens of emergencies. Hitler had hundreds of them, and now Harry Truman seems to have begun with his emergencies. However, an American people bent on forgetting about war, and maintaining peace, are just a little bit fed up with emergency politics. I would go so far as to suggest to our good President that it is going to be difficult to manufacture enough emergencies to carry us through the Presidential elections of 1948.

Mr. Speaker, I read in the morning papers where the Democratic national chairman appealed to the Republican national chairman to join as one on foreign policy. Now, what in the world is our foreign policy? We have been supporting communism in Europe for years.

We have been supporting them and building them up, and now we are using this Greek business as a smoke screen, apparently, to tear them down.

What is our foreign policy?

Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent to ask some questions for 10 minutes, later in the day, about where the Greek deal will lead us.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that today, following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ELLIS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include editorials in each.

Mr. WEICHEL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include newspaper articles in each.

Mr. NORBLAD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

LEADERSHIP NEEDED

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, "The people muddied, thick, and unwholesome in their thoughts and whispers," so said the king when he was discussing the conditions of the Government of Denmark in Shakespeare's play Hamlet. If our people are muddied and thick and unwholesome in their thoughts and whispers, I think the source of that can be found in Washington, D. C. I believe there is plenty of muddied leadership among administration personnel; here in the Congress in both bodies, and I hope the good Lord will assist us in straightening out our own thoughts and getting out of the mud and thus furnishing the type of leadership that our good people deserve from the Congress of the United States.

SIT-IN STRIKE—STIRRING RACE TROUBLE IN OHIO

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, one of the methods of the Communists have of stirring strife in the United States is to stir up trouble between the whites and blacks.

The Reds in the CIO have been very effective and very diligent in that particular, especially in certain sections of the South.

They have now moved north. After stirring up all the race trouble they could in South Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee, Georgia, and Alabama they have now carried the fight into Ohio, and I see that the CIO now is going to sue the Neil House, a leading hotel in Columbus, Ohio, because the white waitresses declined to serve some Negro delegates to a CIO convention there. We are told that a Member of Congress joined in a sit-in strike, a reverse sit-down strike, against those waitresses, and they stayed in that hotel for 6 hours to try to compel those white waitresses to succumb.

Now they propose to sue the Neil Hotel. That is the same strategy that is interwoven in the FEPC program that they have now forced on to New York.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and include an account of this ridiculous incident from the Communist Daily Worker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. The account above referred to as it appeared in the Communist Daily Worker of March 16 is as follows:

HELEN DOUGLAS JOINS CIO SIT-IN

COLUMBUS, OHIO, March 16.—Delegates and speakers to the national education conference of the CIO, including Congresswoman HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS, staged a 6-hour "sit-in" strike today in a hotel coffee shop because waitresses refused to serve Negro delegates.

Representative DOUGLAS (Democrat, California), couldn't stay to see the strike through because she had to catch a train for Washington but she cheered the strikers filling the restaurant in the big chain-operated Neil House Hotel with the words:

"It breaks my heart to have to leave this hotel. I wish you all the success in the world in breaking down the barriers of discrimination."

The conference started an impromptu session in the coffee shop this morning when waitresses walked off the floor rather than serve four Negro men and women delegates.

Delegates then poured in and took over the room, speeches were made and a resolution demanding that the CIO file legal action against the hotel was passed.

Alan Haywood, CIO vice president, brought this message from CIO president Philip Murray: "I want to say the entire CIO is backing you. Keep up the good fight."

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, this was not done to help the Negroes of this country, but it appears to have been done to stir race trouble in the State of Ohio.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Private Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first individual bill on the Private Calendar.

DR. ALMA RICHARDS AND MRS. MARY BLOCK

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 348) for the relief of Dr. Alma Richards and Mrs. Mary Block.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Dr. Alma Richards, Memphis, Tenn., the sum of $10,000, and to Mrs. Mary Block, Memphis, Tenn., the sum of $1,000. The payment of such sums shall be in full settlement of all claims against the United States on account of personal injuries sustained on December 6, 1940, by the said Dr. Alma Richards and Mrs. Mary Block when the automobile in which they were riding was in collision in Memphis, Tenn., with a truck in the service of the Work Projects Administration.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$7,140."

At the end of the bill add the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

VICTORY BIBLE CAMP GROUND

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 173) to authorize the sale of certain public land in Alaska to Victory Bible Camp Ground, Inc.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Victory Bible Camp Ground, Inc., is hereby authorized for a period of 1 year from and after the effective date of this act to file with the Secretary of the Interior an application to purchase, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue patent to it, for use as a recreational camp for young people, what will be when surveyed by the extension of the rectangular surveys, the fractional southwest quarter of the southwest quarter section 23, township 20 north, range 8 east, Seward meridian, Alaska, containing approximately 35 acres.

SEC. 2. The patent shall not be issued until after payment has been made by the Victory Bible Camp Ground, Inc., to the Secretary of the Interior for the land at its reasonable appraised price of not less than $1.25 per acre, to be fixed by the secretary, and shall not include any land covered by a valid existing right initiated under the public-land laws or found by the Secretary of the Interior to be needed for public purposes. The patent shall reserve to the United States the coal and other mineral deposits in the land together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ROSCOE L. WOOD

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 1288) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant a private right-of-way to Roscoe L. Wood.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to grant to Roscoe L. Wood, his heirs and assigns, an easement 15 feet wide from Wilson Avenue to lot 52–E across Federal-owned lots 54 and 52–F and adjacent to the northerly boundaries of said Federal-owned lots for use as a private right-of-way for so long as needed for ingress and egress to and from lot 52–E, block 4, section 4, Cabin John Park, Montgomery County, Md.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FRANCESCO AND NATALIA PICCHI

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 422) for the relief of Francesco and Natalia Picchi.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

EDNA RITA SAFFRON FIDONE

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 555) for the relief of Edna Rita Saffron Fidone.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of the eleventh category of section 3 of the Immigration Act of 1917 (8 U. S. C. 136 (e)), Edna Rita Saffron Fidone, the wife of a citizen of the United States who served honorably in the armed forces of the United States during World War II, may be admitted to the United States for permanent residence under the Act approved December 28, 1945 (Public Law 271, 79th Cong.), if she is found otherwise admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

VERA FRANCES ELICKER

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 621) for the relief of Vera Frances Elicker.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the immigration laws, relating to the issuance of immigration visas for admission to the United States for permanent residence and relating to admissions at ports of entry of aliens as immigrants for permanent residence in the United States, the provisions of section 3 of the Immigration Act of 1917 (39 Stat. 875), as amended (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 136 (e)), which exclude from admission into the United States "persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony, or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude," shall not hereafter be held to apply to Vera Frances Elicker, who is the wife of Robert Lewis Elicker, an American citizen and veteran of World War II, on account of an offense alleged to have been committed abroad while she was about 18 years of age during her legal infancy and prior to her marriage in Australia to Robert Lewis Elicker. If she is found otherwise admissible under the immigration laws an immigration visa may be issued and admission granted to Vera Frances Elicker under this act upon application hereafter filed.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That notwithstanding the provisions of the eleventh category of section 3 of the Immigration Act of 1917 (8 U. S. C. 136 (e)), Vera Frances Elicker, the wife of a citizen of the United States who served honorably in the armed forces of the United States during World War II, may be admitted to the United States for permanent residence under the act approved December 28, 1945 (Public Law 271, 79th Cong.), if she is found otherwise admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NICHOLAS G. KARAS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 1004) amending the act of October 14, 1940, entitled "An act to record the lawful admission to the United States for permanent residence of Nicholas G. Karas."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBSION and Mr. KEATING objected, and, under the rule, the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WILMA E. BAKER

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 326) for the relief of Wilma E. Baker.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Wilma E. Baker, the sum of $3,879.70, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for personal injuries sustained by her on August 17, 1944, near Tigard, Oreg., when the car in which she was traveling was struck by a trailer being used and operated at this time by the United States War Food Administration.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$3,879.70" and insert "$1,379.70."

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. DOLLIVER: Strike out "$1,379.70" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,579.70."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: At the end of the bill insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EARLY O. HARDIN

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 360) for the relief of Early O. Hardin.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Early O. Hardin, Fresno, Calif., the sum of $5,000. The payment of such sum shall be in full settlement of all claims of the said Early O. Hardin for property damage sustained by him and for personal injuries sustained by his minor son, Francis Eugene Hardin, as the result of an accident on December 4, 1943, when a vehicle of the United States engineers caused said Francis Eugene Hardin to be struck at a time when said Francis Eugene Hardin was lawfully standing on the sidewalk at a corner of the intersection of York Boulevard and Figueroa Street, Los Angeles, Calif.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, after "appropriated", strike out the remainder of the bill and insert the following: "To the legal guardian of Francis Eugene Hardin, a minor, of Fresno, Calif., the sum of $3,664.73, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for property damage and personal injuries sustained by the said Francis Eugene Hardin, when he was struck by a falling signal light knocked from its standard by an army truck while he was standing on the sidewalk at a corner of York Boulevard and Figueroa Street, Los Angeles, Calif., on December 4, 1943, and for medical, hospital, and incidental expenses incurred in the treatment of said minor by reason of the injuries sustained by him in said accident: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the legal guardian of Francis Eugene Hardin, a minor."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MRS. ELIZABETH RAINGER AND OTHERS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 384) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth Rainger, Diane Rosser and Roberta Rosser, W. H. Baker, and Mrs. Katherine D. Wert.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to (a) Mrs. Elizabeth Rainger, of Beverly Hills, Calif., the sum of $12,645.23, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for the death of her husband, Ralph Rainger; (b) Diane Rosser and Roberta Rosser, minors, by and through their guardian and mother, Muriel J. Rosser, of Huntington Park, Calif., the sum of $5,113.61, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for the death of their father, Joseph R. Rosser; (c) W. H. Baker, of Williams, Ariz., the sum of $5,000, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for the death of his son, Clinton Baker; and (d) Mrs. Katherine D. Wert, of Glendale, Calif., the sum of $5,318.17, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for the death of her husband, Charles M. Wert; said claims, and each of them, arising from an accident which occurred to an American Airlines, Inc., passenger airplane numbered NC-16017, in which said decedents were riding as passengers at or near Palm Springs, Calif., on October 23, 1942, when said airplane was destroyed as the result of a collision with an airplane of the United States Army Air Forces, of which Second Lt. William N. Wilson, United States Army Air Forces, was the pilot: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, after "to", strike out the remainder of page 1 and page 2 down to "pilot", in line 17, and insert the following in lieu thereof: "W. H. Baker, of Williams, Ariz., the sum of $1,000, in full settlement of all claims of the said W. H. Baker against the United States for the death of his son, Clinton Baker, and to Walter Baker, of Williams, Ariz., the sum of $81.55, in full settlement of all claims of the said Walter Baker for reimbursement of expenses incurred by him in connection with the burial of said Clinton Baker, whose death occurred on October 23, 1942, as the result of the collision of an Army airplane with a commercial transport plane of American Airlines, Inc., in which he was riding."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of W. H. Baker and Walter Baker."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHARLES N. BEMIS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 428) for the relief of Charles N. Bemis.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Charles N. Bemis, of Albany, N. Y., is hereby relieved of liability to the United States in the sum of $105.06, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the said Charles N. Bemis any amounts heretofore paid by him on such indebtedness to the United States. Such indebtedness arose out of the shipment of household goods of the said Charles N. Bemis from Northfield, Vt., to Albany, N. Y., in December 1944, after his change of station as a civil-service employee in the United States Weather Bureau. The transportation charges for such shipment were paid by the United States while the said Charles N. Bemis was legally liable therefor because authority for such shipment had not been obtained within the time allowed by law after the change of station. Any disbursing officer of the United States who disbursed money in payment of the said transportation charges for the said shipment of household goods of the said Charles N. Bemis shall not be liable to the United States by reason of any such disbursement.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ESTATE OF ARCHIE S. WOODS, DECEASED

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 444) for the relief of the estate of Archie S. Woods, deceased.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of Archie S. Woods, deceased, of Rye, N. Y., the sum of $10,000, in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States for compensation for the death of Archie S. Woods, who died as a result of personal injuries sustained by him when the Navy vehicle in which he was riding as a passenger struck another vehicle while en route from Los Angeles, Calif., to consult with the commandant of the United States naval hospital at San Diego, Calif., on April 19, 1944: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$5,664."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BLANCHE E. BROAD

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 620) for the relief of Blanche E. Broad.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Blanche E. Broad, of Beaver Falls, Pa., the sum of $3,000, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for personal injuries and losses sustained by her as a result of a fall in the Capitol of the United States of America in Washington, District of Columbia, on May 31, 1940: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

NELLIE P. DUNN

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 1494) for the relief of Nellie P. Dunn.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Nellie P. Dunn, of Richmond, Va., the sum of $1,507.88, the same being a refund of income tax erroneously collected for the taxable year of 1940: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdeameanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "to", insert the words "the estate of."

Page 1, line 6, strike out the words "the same being a refund" and insert the words "in full settlement of all claims against the United States for the refund."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the estate of Nellie P. Dunn, deceased."

ISAAC B. JONES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2094) for the relief of Isaac B. Jones.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Isaac B. Jones, of Washington, D. C., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $9,000, which sum represents a portion of the loss sustained by the said Isaac B. Jones on the bail bond of Alfred Layton, who was afterward captured as a result of Jones' efforts, convicted, and sentenced on a charge of using the mails to defraud. The said sum of $9,000 being the amount of the forfeited bail bond after deducting the total cost to the United States, and is in accordance with the report and recommendation made by the Attorney General to the chairman, Committee on Claims.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, after "$9,000", insert the words "in full settlement of all claims against the United States."

Page 2, line 5, insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That concludes the call of the Private Calendar.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION ACT

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 145 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 2535) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, passage of this resolution would make in order the immediate consideration of H. R. 2535, a bill to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. The situation this bill would remedy is simply this: The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was given the power to purchase surplus property for resale to small businesses under the Surplus Property Act of 1944. This function was originally vested in the Smaller War Plants Corporation, but was transferred to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by Executive order effective January 28, 1946. The law under which the Smaller War Plants Corporation operated, expired December 31, 1946. The Comptroller General held that the authority to purchase surplus property for resale to small-business concerns expired with the law under which the Smaller War Plants Corporation operated, and it was his opinion that the power could therefore not be transferred to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Attorney General, however, disagrees with this point of view, and holds that these functions and duties continue to exist as a matter of law beyond December 31, 1946, and may continue to be performed by the Government agencies which now exercise them without further issuance of an Executive order. In accord with the opinion of the Attorney General, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation processed approximately 50,000 applications from small businesses. The RFC has actually purchased and resold to small businesses approximately $54,000,000 worth of surplus property since January 28, 1946, when this power was transferred to it from the Smaller War Plants Corporation.

H. R. 2535 merely resolves by statute the differences of opinion of the Comptroller General and the Attorney General regarding this point of law.

The Committee on Banking and Currency was unanimous in its report on H. R. 2535, and I understand there is no objection to the bill from the Comptroller General or the Attorney General. Therefore, the Committee on Rules has provided but 1 hour of general debate on the measure. House Resolution 145 making in order consideration of H. R. 2535 embodies a general rule to which I think there should be no objection. Amendments to the bill may be offered under the 5-minute rule, and one motion to recommit has been provided should any objection arise to the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

WORLD IS ONCE MORE IN DANGER FROM FORCES OF DARKNESS AND DEATH

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed out of order for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, today 9 years have elapsed since I made a speech on this floor calling attention to dangers approaching our Nation and the world. At that time I called attention to the tacit agreement and understanding then existing between Hitler, Mussolini, and the Japanese war lords. I pointed out that notwithstanding Hitler's claim that he was fighting communism, he actually was trying to dominate and control the world, in unholy alliance with Mussolini and the Japs; that he himself intended to be master of all Europe. I prophesied that not only would he take Austria, the Sudetenland, Czechoslovakia, Danzig, Poland, and other eastern and middle European countries, but would, because of disunity and internal betrayal in France, be able to bring about the conquest of France.

GREAT BRITAIN WAITED TOO LONG

I pointed out that Great Britain, feeling herself secure because she had secretly encouraged and collaborated with Hitler under Chamberlain and his Tory leaders, since his rise to power, and because she herself coveted no Russian possessions but wanted only Russia's growing strength and unity checked, had waited too long for her own good in preparing for Hitler's contemplated war to subjugate the people of Europe.

At that time I urged and advised the nations of the world, especially Poland, Czechoslovakia, Norway, Sweden, and all other small states of Europe to place no trust or confidence in Hitler's lying assurances; not to believe him, when he said that he wanted no more territory, and desired only to combat communism. I warned them all that his declarations of friendly intentions were not to be trusted, and that it was his positive intention, after having penetrated each country with his fifth column of quislings and traitors, to pick them off one by one. And I warned my own country, these United States, that the Hitler fifth column existed here and in every country of the Americas.

HISTORY PROVES TRUTH OF WARNINGS

That everything I said at that time, 9 years ago, was proved bitterly true by history is a matter of profound sorrow to me. That I was right is no comfort to me, and cannot relieve my brief.

If the nations of the world, and the people of the nations, had heeded my advice, and had taken united action, Hitler never could have succeeded in bringing about the penetration and defeat of most of the countries of Europe where his barbarous hordes overran the governments (except in those countries, like Franco Spain and Turkey, which indirectly collaborated with the Nazis) and murdered and destroyed, so that to stop his mad career of rapine and conquest cost the United States alone a million casualties and 4 years of production for war, lost forever to the pursuits of peace; while in the rest of the tortured world an estimated total of 20,000,000 lives were sacrificed to the Axis powers in their ruthless drive for supremacy.

I therefore most respectfully ask that I be permitted to insert in my remarks some excerpts from the speech I made 9 years ago, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. I hope that some of the Members, although I know, of course, how extremely busy all are, will read at least some of the excerpts from that speech. It should be a lesson to our enemies and a reminder to our friends. I warned our Nation, and I warned the people of the world, as I am warning the American people now, that we must be careful in our actions and not permit ourselves to be swayed by a few who constantly try to make us believe another war is inevitable, and who are willing to imitate the Hitler lies that our only danger is communism, which were effective, and enabled him to gain the support of the financiers of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in America, and in the American way of life, and I believe that the American people can and will resist every danger to our way of living.

WHO INVITED GREAT BRITAIN TO GREECE?

As I said on this floor yesterday, and I repeat again today, it is my firm prayer that we will not be swayed or influenced by any nation, any militaristic country, to take arms and responsibility for pledges and promises which they never intended to fulfill when they made them.

The British now want only to unload their commitments and responsibilities onto us, since they have failed.

But now, may I ask, Mr. Speaker, who asked Great Britain to assume these alleged responsibilities? Who asked England to send tanks, troops, armored cars, warplanes, against a friendly nation, an ally, a victim, and one of the first and most pitiful victims of Nazi terror?

What spokesman of the Greek people, the fathers of democracy and freedom, asked Great Britain to reinstate this German princeling, George II, who has not one drop of Greek blood in his veins, by force of arms? What Greek wishes to continue the ruthless business domination of all Greek industry by British finance?

Why, if Great Britain cannot continue her subsidies of the despotic and undemocratic governments of Greece and Turkey, can she afford to maintain a standing army of a hundred thousand in Palestine at an annual cost of $160,000,000?

But I must not deviate.

GREAT BRITAIN INTRIGUED AGAINST RUSSIA

We must not allow ourselves to be made the catspaw for England in her centuries-old intrigue against Russia.

Between England and Russia is, and always has been, fundamentally the clash of empires. Time after time has England frustrated Russia's ambitions for a warm-water outlet for her commerce.

It is not my purpose to debate the merits of that conflict. I merely wish to state the facts. There has never been ease between the two empires. For countless miles across the Continents of Europe and of Asia their spheres of possession and domination run parallel.

When Hitler was preparing to set out on his bloody conquests, Russia was aware that England was prodding Germany, and was mindful of British intrigues against her.

Russia had not forgotten that in 1918 it was England who instigated the allied expeditionary force into Siberia in the effort to overthrow the new Russian Government. Russia knows from experience that England never hesitates to turn against an ally, even before the peace treaties are signed—as now—if she believes it will be to the advantage of the British Empire.

LET US HEED ADMONITIONS OF WASHINGTON AND OF JEFFERSON

I hope that the United States will continue to be the leading power of the world; that we shall be the arbiters between all those who are in discord; and that we can bring about a just and lasting peace which will insure not only prosperity but happiness and contentment to all people.

I hope that we will wholeheartedly support the United Nations, and not desert that ideal of world adjudication as we did the League of Nations; that we shall feed the hungry, minister to the sick and devastated, clothe the naked, and give moral support and even substantial aid to all people who truly desire freedom and liberty and the democratic way of life.

But it is my most fervent hope that we can do all this short of the cost of a single American life; and that we shall heed the admonitions of Washington and Jefferson, to enter into military alliances with none, but to remain friendly with all.

In accordance with the leave given me, Mr. Speaker, I insert at this point extracts from my speech on the House of Representatives on March 18, 1938, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

TODAY, PERHAPS MORE THAN AT ANY OTHER TIME IN ITS HISTORY, THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA STANDS OUT AGAINST THE DARK AND STORMY SEAS OF RACIAL PERSECUTION, INTRIGUE, CONSPIRACY, AND JEALOUSY AS THE ONE AND ONLY ENDURING BEACON LIGHT OF HOPE

(Speech of Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives, March 18, 1938)

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if an archangel were to come down from heaven and make an observation in the interest of peace, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish] would criticize it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish] continues daily attacks upon the President and every member of the Cabinet, with statements which strike me as "sound and fury signifying nothing." His charges are empty ones; his statements ridiculous.

It is not necessary that I defend the speech made yesterday by Secretary Hull nor the speech made at Chicago by the President. They both gave clear summaries of deplorable foreign conditions, and were intended to be deterents to militaristic nations. Both warned against a continued belligerency against small, peaceful, independent nations and the killing of innocent women and children, and carried to the peaceful democracies of the world an assurance of our deep interest.

It is to be regretted that there are other Members here who find it convenient for political purposes continually to criticize the efforts of our great President, and also today to criticize our great Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull. I had the honor and distinction of serving here with Secretary Hull many years. I have served here during the tenures of many able Secretaries of State, and Presidents, and I can honestly say that I never have met a more honorable, a more sincere, and a more devoted American, or a greater statesman than our present Secretary Hull. [Applause.]

Also unwarranted is the criticism by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Maverick] that the Secretary of State yesterday appealed to the press for fair play. Instead of being criticized, Mr. Hull should be commended for his effort to obtain from the press fair treatment of the administration and the cause of peace.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. MAVERICK. I did not criticize the Secretary of State. I said specifically that was all right, but I hoped the day would come when the Secretary might be able to make his speeches here.

Mr. SABATH. I am pleased with the gentleman's explanation. Unfortunately, as has been stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Snell], under present law the Secretary of State or any other member of the Cabinet cannot address the House. It might be well, perhaps, if we were to change the rules and make such a procedure possible.

WHY I AM SUPPORTING PENDING NAVAL BILL

Heretofore, Mr. Chairman, I have been against militarism and especially great battleships; but the conditions confronting the Nation today are such that I cannot help but follow the advice of this great Secretary of State; and for that reason I shall vote for and support the bill that is before us today. As I stated before, I have been for years against the construction of these great expensive battleships. I remember when the late distinguished gentleman from Alabama, Admiral Hobson, a member of the House, pleaded incessantly for battleships, pointing out the dangers that confronted us from Japan; I then ridiculed the idea, as I believed it was unwise to spend millions and millions on what I then designated as cowardly battleships that needed many auxiliaries, such as cruisers, destroyers, and minelayers to protect themselves at sea.

I feel, however, that I am not possessed of either the experience, the ability, or the technical knowledge possessed by the men who have devoted their lives to national defense. I do not feel that I am qualified to say to them that my judgment is better than theirs and should be followed. I have confidence in these men, believing they are just as loyal, just as patriotic, and just as desirous of protecting our Nation and our flag as any of us. [Applause.]

* * * * *

I myself have, as I have said, at all times opposed militarism in all its forms—the ambitions of the professional militaristic gentlemen and the unconscionable war profiteers. I never have lined up with their ambitious schemes; but I am for proper national defense.

* * * * *

Although I did not actively participate in the World War, yet during the trying days of 1917 and 1918 I endeavored, to the best of my poor ability, to alleviate the sufferings and heartaches of the mothers, wives, brothers, and sisters of our soldiers and abundantly to provide for our forces abroad and at home.

Subsequent to the war I was a stanch advocate of the League of Nations, which, I firmly believe, would have prevented international lawlessness or at least minimized all future danger of war.

Not until 1912, when I had the pleasure of obtaining the privilege of the House floor for Count Luetzow, ex-Austrian statesman who visited the United States to warn of the dangers of the approaching European war and advocate measures tending to universal peace, and shortly thereafter, when I heard the late President of the Republic of Czechoslovakia, Professor Masaryk, lucidly explain the aspiration of Germany to acquire by any means necessary not only control of middle western Europe and the countries of the Danube but also another outlet to the sea, did I really begin to give serious thought to the danger of the then approaching war.

EXPRESSED BELIEF IN SECRET CONSPIRACY 3 YEARS AGO

Three years ago I voiced belief that a secret or tacit agreement existed between Hitler, Mussolini, and Japan, but my warning went unheeded. The strategy practiced by those countries conformed exactly to that predicted by Professor Masaryk, who was intimately aware of Germany's ambitions.

In the Orient Japan pursued a course toward domination, apparently with preassurance that Italy and Germany would so engage the attention of the European democracies that interference in China would be impossible.

In Ethiopia Mussolini's war machine grinded to its conquest while Hitler's silence gave approval.

Internal dissent in Spain, nourished by the dictator countries, finally flamed into civil war, and the legions of Italian and German soldiers took stand in battle against the established government.

Hitler, demanding the return of Germany's lost colonies, only cloaked his purpose of European aggression, and it was long ago clear that he would one day climax the years of planned propaganda in Austria by an invasion of that country. His seizure of Austria is but a prelude of more ambitious plans. Peace- and liberty-loving Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, and the other small independent nations now see his shadow across their lands—Memel, Danzig, and the Polish Corridor, Alsace-Lorraine, and the much-desired Ukraine.

For the time being, engaged in consolidating his gains, he may utter reassuring words to Poland and Yugoslavia. But they have only to recall his utter disregard of treaties, and his oft-repeated statements as to his ultimate aims, to realize how necessary it is that they prepare to resist invasion, for invasion is bound to come.

IL DUCE MAY BE MAKING SAD MISTAKE IN TRUSTING HITLER

Whether Il Duce is as smart as he thinks he is in cooperating with the imperialistic-minded Hitler only the future will tell. But there are many sapient observers who have their doubts. They believe that Hitler will not hesitate to throw his new comrade, Il Duce, overboard when and if he becomes strong enough to be able to get along without him.

AMERICA MUST TAKE NOTE OF WHAT IS GOING ON IN THE WORLD

One may properly ask how does all this affect America? Who knows? In this fateful hour, with all the civilized world well-nigh breathless, I do not feel that we should follow the vacillating policy of Great Britain, who, in the opinion of many well-qualified students of international affairs, may be the next prey of the remorseless triumvirate. Many ripe scholars feel the suppression of Great Britain will mean the consummation of a plan to form three great powers outside of North and South America. I doubt very much that France, which is fighting domestic problems with her back to the wall, and Russia, despised by the capitalistic groups of the world, could, after the disappearance of the other countries I have named, long withstand being dismembered also. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind but that Hitler, Mussolini, and the raving-mad Japanese war lords are in a conspiracy to divide the entire world among themselves, or at least as much of it as they can manage to grab.

POLISH LEADERS SHOULD NOT FORGET TREATMENT ACCORDED POLES IN PRUSSIA

Great Britain, rather late, is commencing to realize its danger. Does Poland realize her danger?

The leaders in Poland might well hark back to other days, and consider the former treatment of Poles in Prussia. I remember in 1908 how Prussia prohibited, by edict, the teaching of the Polish language in their own schools, and how they proposed in their Parliament a compulsory dispossession of the homes of Polanders. For 2,000 years the Poles and their fathers before them had occupied this land, but notwithstanding and in contravention of the Congress of Vienna of 1815, and in violation of Prussia's organic laws prohibiting distinctions between citizens of the Kingdom, that Kingdom's Parliament even then showed its prejudice and discrimination against the Polish.

At the time I speak of, Congressman Arthur L. Bates, of Pennsylvania, was impelled to introduce into this House a resolution extending good wishes and sympathy to the Poles in Prussia in their efforts to maintain their property rights.

Recalling this, and viewing the present prejudice which governs in Germany, Poland should properly estimate the future insofar as her relations with that country are concerned.

AMERICA MAY NOT BE AS SAFE AS SHE FEELS

Up to about 12 years ago we confidently believed ourselves properly protected against possible attack from any and all quarters; but in view of the increased and ever-increasing knowledge of aviation and mammoth airplane carriers, are we really free from military danger?

If this nefarious triumvirate should effect the dismemberment of the great British Empire, what would become of Canada? Could we still feel free and at ease without present-day Canada?

Only a little while ago I read in the public press about concessions that had been or were contemplated to be granted by Mexico to Japan in Lower California. That recalled to my mind the tentative offe by Germany in 1917, in the Zimmerman note, to give Mexico a part of the United States if Mexico would join Germany, and the offer to Japan of the Philippine Islands in return for military aid. When those audacious offers were first brought to light it was thought they were sheer Allied propaganda, but we were convinced of the authenticity of these reports by documentary evidence that came into possession of our Government.

In view of all this, and our enemies within, I feel that it behooves us adequately to protect ourselves against even the remotest eventuality. I have heard it said with plausibility that if England had stated her position unequivocally in the early days of 1914, and if America had been prepared in 1916, these acts would have had a most salutary effect, and it would not have been necessary to send millions of our young men across the sea and expend billions of dollars. Consequently, and repeating, I feel that we owe it to ourselves to prepare for any, even the most imaginable possibility. Therefore I am ready to vote for the construction of a navy and an air force that will be unmistakably adequate for our proper defense.

DO NOT CLAIM TO BE MORE PATRIOTIC THAN THOSE WHO DISAGREE

It is not my aim to try to make anybody believe I am more patriotic than those who do not favor this increased naval plan. We all recognize among that group a highly patriotic impulse. They, too, think their judgment would be better for the country. The only interest I have in the problem of national defense is the welfare of our whole country, to which I owe much and for which I am ready to give everything I possess. This great country of my adoption has been kind to me, and if I leave behind only one legacy, I want it to be a contribution, weak though it be, to the defense, not offense, and the promotion of the welfare of the land that made me whatever I am and gave me whatever I have.

Let me say that I feel a grave mistake was made by some of the political leaders of 20 years ago, who, for purely political purposes, prevented the United States from joining other peace-loving nations in a hopeful effort to outlaw war and all its frightful consequences by the League of Nations. That failure unquestionably weakened the League at the outset, and it has in no small measure destroyed its usefulness.

I well remember when President Wilson returned from his first trip to Paris and invited the members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs to the White House to hear his explanation of the League plan, because I was at the time a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The only sitting members of the Committee on Foreign Relations are Senators PITTMAN and BORAH. I am the only sitting Member of the House who participated in that historic meeting.

Mr. Wilson made a confidential report to the members of these two committees, and in a 3-hour session he endeavored to obtain the advice and consent of those present. All present were asked to question the President on each and every provision, which many, as I recall, did, and all were apparently satisfied by the President's lucid and masterly exposition of the infinite possibilities of that great humanitarian plan. In addition to securing the advice and consent of the members of those two committees, Mr. Wilson consulted such eminent Americans and Republicans as former President Taft, former Secretary of State Elihu Root, and others, all of whom acquiesced in the President's conclusions. I especially remember that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of that time, Mr. Lodge, of Massachusetts, propounded to President Wilson many questions and appeared satisfied, yet a few months later, unfortunately, the same Senator Lodge who had given unmistakable assurance of accord with the plan, became, in his important official position, the spearhead, largely for political purposes, of the opposition to the League plan. It is a fact that there was opposition to the League of Nations, simply because it was the only issue Republican leaders of that day could evolve in opposing the Democratic Party. In this opposition they were aided by the disgruntled, vitriolic Jim Reed, then a Senator from Missouri.

It was alleged that the League Covenant provided for sending our boys across the sea; while in fact there was nothing in the League Covenant that justified such a conclusion. I maintained then, and I repeat, that the underlying opposition to the League, aside from the political consideration, was the objection of industrial leaders of the Nation to the international labor provisions, which provided, in article 20 of the Covenant of the League, that—

"The high contracting parties will endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and to that end will agree to establish as part of the organization of the League a permanent bureau of labor."

BELIEVE AMERICA'S MEMBERSHIP OF THE LEAGUE WOULD HAVE BEEN BENEFICIAL

I am confident today, beyond all doubt, that had the United States joined the League of Nations it would have strengthened and preserved the League in full vigor and effectiveness and we would not have present-day conditions, with all democracies of Europe either destroyed or on the verge of destruction. I still believe that under the terms of the League Covenant we could have precluded the mad rearmament race by close adhesion to and renewal of the provisions of the Washington Arms Conference after the 10-year limit, to the lasting benefit of all civilization. At the conclusion of the Washington Arms Conference the United States felt fairly easy; and it was only our absence from membership in the League that led first Germany, then Italy, and, shortly thereafter, Japan to withdraw from membership in the League. Then trouble began. The plot thickened.

Moreover, I feel that if Great Britain and France had taken a firm stand against the initial rearmament of Hitler, Mussolini, and Japan, and had not been lulled to sleep by undependable peace assurances, they would have been in position 2 years ago to stop Mussolini and Hitler in their mad rush toward a menacing world conquest. Should we, then, follow the vacillating and always unloading policy of Great Britain or should we be ready to properly defend ourselves and our possessions against any and all?

I LIKE TO FEEL THAT I CAN CHANGE MY VIEWPOINTS IN ACCORDANCE WITH CHANGED CONDITIONS

And so, in conclusion, let me say that in view of the alarming world conditions to which I have alluded, I shall vote and work for the passage of the pending bill. This may be surprising to some of the critics who have accused me of being a pacifist, charging that I was against adequate national defense; but let me say to them it is not they who have changed my view. I was just as conscientious when I opposed large Army and Navy appropriations in past years as I am conscientious today in supporting this bill. I have changed my views because and only because world conditions have changed. When I get so old or so benumbed of brain and character that I cannot change my view in accordance with changing conditions and a changing world, it is time for me to be carried out feet first, and I want to be.

I have criticized conditions and things at times, and I shall do so again whenever I see anything that I think merits criticism. But I love this country. I will vote any amount of money necessary to protect it from enemies either within or without. Today, perhaps more than at any other time in its history, the United States of America stands out against the dark and stormy seas of racial persecution, intrigue, conspiracy, and jealousy as the one and only enduring beacon light of hope.

I am grateful to the people of my district for having permitted me for so many years to be a Member of this great American Congress, the greatest democratic legislative body on earth, wherein every man is accorded the unfettered right to say what he pleases. Let us strive to preserve and promote this priceless heritage for ourselves and posterity. I do not expect to be here forever, but I do want the Stars and Stripes and a democratic form of government to endure here forever.

GRATIFIED BY EFFORT TO HELP SMALL BUSINESS CONSTRUCTIVELY

Mr. SABATH. Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the resolution, I am indeed gratified that the committee has recommended this legislation and that I have been able to join the members of the Rules Committee in reporting out this rule which makes in order a bill to aid the Nation's small businesses. Frequently you have heard me plead for small business. We have adopted legislation before intended in the interest of small business; but unfortunately we have not as yet succeeded in bringing about that help, that cooperation, and that assistance to small businessmen of this country which should be the wish of each and every one of us and that I have hoped we would be able to bring about.

Notwithstanding the antitrust and fair-trade laws, the big trusts and combinations which seem unfortunately to control American business are so avaricious that they are ready and willing to remove all independent dealers and manufacturers in our land and thus destroy free enterprise. It should be our duty to continue to aid those who actually need our help. This action on our part does not mean helping big business; it means help to small business. That is what the bill provides, help against the combined large industries which today control, as they have for such a long time, the major portion of our production and of our business, and which, while we were winning World War II, swallowed up 1,800 independent establishments.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RICH. I have no further requests for time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2535) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2535, with Mr. CASE of South Dakota in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is rather an urgent matter. It was introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PLOESER] on March 13, and the committee considered it and reported it out the following day, March 14.

It, in effect, continues the authority which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been exercising for some time with respect to the purchase sale and financing of smaller war plants. By reference to the report, which is very short and clear, you will find that the function which has been exercised by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation originally was vested in the Smaller War Plants Corporation. Under executive order that power and authority was vested in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Smaller War Plants Corporation expired by operation of law on December 31, 1946, and the Attorney General gave an opinion at that time that notwithstanding the expiration of the life of the Smaller War Plants Corporation the power continued in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to perform the functions with respect to smaller war plants which the Smaller War Plants Corporation had been exercising. Later, however, the Comptroller General gave an opinion that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was without present authority to exercise those powers.

So this bill vests in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the powers formerly exercised by the Smaller War Plants Corporation in the acquisition and disposal and financing of the smaller war plants. To validate the commitments which have been made previous to the opinion of the Comptroller General and since the termination of the power vested in the Smaller War Plants Corporation, the committee has offered an amendment to make the bill retroactive to January 1, 1947.

I should make it clear that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation expires on June 30, 1947, and the authority we are giving the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under this bill of course expires on that date if the Congress does not continue the life of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation beyond that date. In the meantime, the House Committee on Banking and Currency will have hearings on whether we are to extend the life of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and of course we will give consideration to whether this particular activity shall be continued beyond June 30, 1947, even though the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is continued.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] has fully explained this bill. It was reported by the committee without a dissenting vote. It is an emergency measure. If we expect little business concerns to get any surplus property this bill must be passed. It is important.

The Comptroller General about a week ago ruled that the RFC must discontinue the exercise of its priority in the purchase of surplus property for resale to small business concerns. The purpose of this bill is to allow the RFC to make available to small business concerns the priority of purchase of surplus property as provided in the Surplus Property Act of 1944 and to give the Corporation authority to make or guarantee loans to small business in connection with certain surplus property, which authority the Corporation thought it had until the ruling of the Comptroller General of March 10. The 3,500 applicants, whose applications are now pending, should be accommodated at once, and I am informed similar applications are coming in at the rate of over 2,000 per month.

The RFC has purchased and resold to small business nearly $54,000,000 worth of surplus property, and, as stated by the author of the bill, the competitive position of small business must be maintained as long as the general priority system is in effect with respect to surplus property.

I desire to congratulate the author of the bill for the interest he has taken in this matter since the ruling of the Comptroller General became known. I am sure the business people of this country, especially those who, for lack of funds, were not in position to take advantage of the opportunity to purchase the surplus property offered for sale, appreciate his efforts.

I think everyone, on account of the emergency at this time, hopes the bill will be passed without further delay.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FOLGER].

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the pending measure, I am sure there will not be any objection to it. I congratulate the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PLOESER] on his industry and interest in bringing the matter before the Congress. It is of the highest importance. I of course am highly gratified that the bill is before the House. I think it is necessary.

Mr. Chairman, I have asked permission to proceed for a few minutes out of order. As far as the bill now under consideration is concerned, my remarks are not further addressed to that subject: But I am asking the question, Whither are we going?

Our country had its beginning in opposition to tyranny and oppression. It is written in our Constitution that that instrument is founded on the ideal of freedom, domestic tranquillity and the general welfare. These to ourselves and our posterity.

We believe in democracy: We would that all nations should accept it. By precept and example, we are under a moral obligation, in our opinion, to offer the ideal to all nations. We believe it will be best for them and make them happier.

But when did it become our privilege to demand its acceptance at the point of the sword? What hope have we, or can we have, that this liberty, this freedom, this democracy may be imposed by force?

We regret that Greece, as is told, in a time of impotency and distress, was offered no choice except a choice between a totalitarian and Fascist regime on the one hand and Communist control on the other. They did not choose either, but, of necessity, acceded to the imposition of a kingship, rather than fall to communism. It is to be admitted that under the King and an unrepresentative, discredited parliament they can have no democracy. That word is derived from the Greek language, meaning the rule and authority of the people.

They no doubt desire this for their government. If it is likely that any presumptuous power threatens denial of this right, the time has come for the United Nations organization to step in. It is charged by some, and denied by others, that Great Britain has somewhat to repent of; that when the elections in Greece were not so long ago held, Great Britain, by military power, actually present in Greece, forced an incompetent king on Greece, with a parliament uninterested in the welfare of the people, and strangers to democracy.

It is charged that the people had only the choice to accept this king, with his Fascist regime, on the one hand, or communism on the other; that they, therefore, bowed to the former rather than to communism.

M. Sophianopoulos, former Greek Minister, told the American Foreign Policy Association, recently:

> That in the interest of the whole country the King should dissolve this unrepresentative and discredited parliament.

The King did not do this. Why not the United Nations handle this matter? While we, if necessary, furnish these people food and clothing and shelter. I agree we cannot let them starve. But I do not want to shoot them—any of them. If the people in Greece are in such a pitiable plight, under their present government, that they will turn to communism, their condition is most deplorable. Have their masters—rulers—been so Fascist-minded as to drive them now to that which they disdained in a former election? Why has a foreign army been needed or required to make them endure the government they have had? What sort of King, with his appendages, is it they have had to bow to?

Why not let the United Nations organization honestly investigate and advise? Have we, in this country, gotten to the point where all you have to say to bring us to any sort of ill-advised, extreme measures is "Communist"?

As among our own people, is it true that in the minds of some, unless a man is a reactionary, a Tory, and an isolationist, all rolled in one, he is a Communist?

Those in China who revolt against the militaristic Kuomintang Fascist regime are not regarded as engaged in a revolution against such totalitarian authority, but are dismissed as Communists; and that's as far as inquiry goes. Except for the honest report made by Gen. George Marshall.

So far as I am concerned, I am not ready to vote for something that may send our boys into another war, to perpetuate intolerable Fascist authority anywhere; and this in spite of my opposition to communism for any people. Let us offer them democracy, with all the word implies. That is a sure cure for totalitarianism and communism, too. But let us offer democracy in a democratic way.

Practically speaking, let us send these people food; and put the United Nations organization to work; and let them tell all nations to stay out while the job is being done.

Through the United Nations our voice and warnings may be heard; and we, as others, can say, "We are proceeding, but in an orderly way, and the integrity of United Nations is preserved."

How do we become policeman of the world? Are we to drop the United Nations organization and proceed to do all the things at once it was formed to do? I fail to see reason in this. Maybe I just need to be enlightened.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PLOESER].

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Chairman, I intend to be brief but I think there are some things which might well be said to clarify the record and the bill.

First, I want to read to the Committee section 18 (e) of the War Surplus Property Act:

(e) The Smaller War Plants Corporation shall have the power to purchase any surplus property for resale, subject to regulations of the Board, to small business (and is empowered to receive other property in exchange as partial or full payment therefor), when in its judgment, such disposition is required to preserve and strengthen the competitive position of small business, or will assist the Corporation in the discharge of the duties and responsibilities imposed upon it. The provisions of subsections (a) and (c) of section 12 shall be applicable to purchases made by the Smaller War Plants Corporation under this subsection.

This power was extended when the President dissolved the Small War Plants Corporation. It was extended to the RFC, and the RFC continued to practice that privilege and power until the General Accounting Office ruled against them last week. The expiration of the SWPC charter December 31, 1946, was the basis for the ruling.

This bill does nothing more than reinstate the power which did exist and which did so much good in permitting smaller businesses to obtain this surplus property. It has no effect on the life of the RFC. I believe, in addition, it ought to be said in the case of emergency, such as this, the Committee on Banking and Currency, as well as the Committee on Rules, should be highly complimented on the way they have worked. This bill was introduced last Thursday. It passed out of the Committee on Banking and Currency Friday morning and out of the Committee on Rules yesterday morning and is before us today. If it had not been for the splendid cooperation of the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Georgia and other members of the Committee on Rules who have cooperated so splendidly, this well could have gone on for several weeks to the great injury of thousands of small business organizations.

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PLOESER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COUDERT. I take it that this bill imposes no time limitation upon the exercise of that power by the RFC except the time limitation of the RFC itself?

Mr. PLOESER. Yes, and that is June 30, 1947.

Mr. COUDERT. The reason I asked that, Mr. Chairman, is because I understand there is pending in both Houses a bill to extend the power of the Federal Reserve banks to extend or guarantee loans to small businesses. I wonder if there is any duplication involved in this or a conflict—if the gentleman knows.

Mr. PLOESER. No, there is none whatever. As I said before, this merely reinstates the authority which the RFC has been exercising since the Executive order transferring the Smaller War Plants Corporation's duties and authorities. This lasts merely for the life of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It is not any additional authority. It is a reinstatement of authority which evidently became illegal on March 10 or 11.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that all Americans would sacrifice in order that the hungry be fed, that those without shelter be housed, and those without clothes receive them. But it seems to me that as we begin to consider what doubtless will become known as the Greek deal—we should deliberately separate the question of food, clothing, and shelter from what the President has asked the Congress to do.

President Truman stated that the Greek situation was only one aspect of a world-wide global situation. In effect, he stated that we must be prepared to support, to finance, to sustain, economically and militarily, any government anywhere in the world whose overthrow or change might point that nation or people in the direction of communism.

Now, Mr. Chairman, President Truman is not asking us to give him $400,000,000 to play around with in Greece and Turkey. On the contrary, he is asking us to support and adopt as a national policy the commitment to underwrite in an unlimited manner the status quo throughout the world.

Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the question: What is encompassed within this policy? If we appropriate for Greece and Turkey this initial $400,000,000, does it mean that upon similar requests from the British and Greek Governments or the Turkish Government that we in good faith have committed ourselves to a continuing policy in regard to similar appropriations in the future?

Let us take it a step further.

If the British ask us to assume their commitments in Italy, Austria, France, Belgium, Holland, and Western Germany, have we in principle committed ourselves to assume those obligations?

I believe that this is a very real question because obviously this entire area of Europe will not be stably reconstituted on the old prewar basis.

I would like to ask a further question. In respect to Asia as a whole, do we, by granting this appropriation and the powers which the President has requested—do we commit ourselves financially and militarily to the maintenance of British rule in Egypt, Palestine, Irak, Iran, India, Burma, and the Malay Peninsula? This is not an idle question, Mr. Chairman, because the British obviously are not able to meet their economic, financial, or military commitments any longer anywhere in Europe or in Asia. The British Empire, built up over several hundred years as a method of securing markets and exploiting subject peoples, is at an end. Have we committed ourselves to assume these responsibilities when we vote the appropriations for which the President asks?

In brief, Mr. Chairman, what are the implications of this global policy for which President Truman has asked $400,000,000? Where does it end and what will it cost? Perhaps someone may feel that I am a penny pincher in regard to the taxpayers' money by asking these questions. If so, let it be said now that I am a penny pincher in protecting the Public Treasury. What will this global policy cost, Mr. Chairman? For example, suppose that we budget Greece and Turkey at one billion per year.

Suppose we then budget western Germany at a minimum one billion per year. Now let us put in another billion, roughly, per year for France, Italy, Belgium, Austria, and Holland.

Let us then add two billion per year for the remainder of the British Empire in Asia and the Middle East. So far, this comes to five billion per year, with no end in sight, or time limit set. Such an estimate, of course, does not include the funds which will be needed in regard to Japan, the Philippines, or China. For if we were to undertake Mr. Truman's Greek policy in respect to Japan and China, it would doubtless cost us an additional two or three billion dollars a year. You will note that I have not mentioned South America, which today is in a constant process of social and political change.

Mr. Chairman, what does this policy cost? Where will it lead? What does it include? What is contemplated by this policy? A taxpayer wants to know the answers to these questions, and I wish to submit them now, publicly, here in the House, to our State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further requests for time, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5e of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 15, sec. 606a), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(d) (1) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall have the power to purchase any surplus property for resale, subject to regulations of the War Assets Administrator or his successor, to small business (and is empowered to receive other property in exchange as partial or full payment therefor), when in its judgment, such disposition is required to preserve and strengthen the competitive position of small business, or will assist the Corporation in the discharge of the duties and the responsibilities imposed upon it. The purchase of surplus property under this subsection shall be given priority under the Surplus Property Act of 1944, as amended, immediately following transfers to Government agencies under section 12 of such act, as amended, and disposals to veterans under section 16 of such act, as amended. The provisions of section 12 (c) of the Surplus Property Act of 1944, as amended, shall be applicable to purchases made under this subsection.

"(2) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized, for the purpose of carrying out the objectives of this subsection, to make or guarantee loans to small business enterprises in connection with the acquisition, conversion, and operation of plants and facilities which have been determined to be surplus property, and, in cooperation with the disposal agencies, to arrange for sales of surplus property to small business concerns on credit or time basis.

"(3) For the purposes of this subsection the terms 'surplus property', 'Government agency', and 'disposal agency' have the same meaning as is assigned to such terms by section 3 of the Surplus Property Act of 1944, as amended."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "That", insert "effective as of January 1, 1947."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

There being none, under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2535) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, pursuant to House Resolution 145, he reported the same back to the House with an amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BUFFETT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

IS TRUMAN PLAYING INTO STALIN'S HANDS?

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Truman demands large-scale American intervention in the political, economic, and military affairs of the Balkans. He tells us other lands must have similar intervention.

This proposal prompts me to repeat a comment by Lord Welby, once Treasury head for England. Shortly before World War I started the British Empire toward liquidation, Lord Welby declared:

> We are in the hands of an organization of crooks. They are politicians, generals, manufacturers of armaments, and journalists. All of them are anxious for unlimited expenditure, and go on inventing scares to terrify the public and to terrify Ministers of the Crown.

Probably Mr. Truman's demand does not reflect the kind of scare Lord Welby reported. And so, it may have another origin. Could that origin be that American intervention in Greece has been craftily connived for by the Kremlin, and that Mr. Truman has swallowed the bait?

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I want to make one fact clear. I am not happy talking about foreign affairs. I would prefer to leave that field to others.

But as an American, I am ashamed and appalled by the recent record of failure in foreign affairs. So I cannot remain silent while new and more ghastly blunders are concocted.

A TRAGIC RECORD OF FAILURE

Truly no one could possibly have handled our foreign affairs much worse than the present administration. It is tragic to have to confess that American blood and treasure was used to deliver into communistic tyranny the lands of Poland, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania, Hungary, Manchukuo, and large parts of Germany, Austria, Finland, China, Korea, and Japan. But it is true.

Even yet it is hard to believe that 400,000 American boys died for the Atlantic Charter and that instead their sacrifice was used to expand communism over two continents.

Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to assess the enormity of this failure. A man from Mars reviewing it would come to one or the other of two conclusions—either our Government has been in the control of Communists, or it has been in the hands of terribly stupid people completely fooled by the Communists.

As the first conclusion would indicate unlimited treachery and treason, it must be ruled out. Left with the second alternative—that the administration has been terribly stupid and misled—we must consider the present Truman demands in the light of that record.

Lacking only the former head man and some minor characters, the present administration, including its Republican collaborators, is the same assortment of officials that have steered America to the brink of chaos. Surely then we must examine their schemes now with the utmost skepticism.

DOES THE LEOPARD CHANGE ITS SPOTS?

Mr. Speaker, for 14 years the New Deal party brazenly carried water for communism in America and throughout the world. Now we are asked to believe that overnight it has changed into the world-wide champion of anticommunism.

While welcoming administration professions of anticommunism, Congress and the people should remember that the Good Book says, "By their fruits ye shall know them." A management which has committed 14 years of blunders for communism is hardly qualified, because of an almost overnight reformation, to be given a blank check for a crusade against communism.

Mr. Speaker, suppose this intervention proposal fits right into Stalin's plans? If American intervention in the Balkans is what the Communists want, we had better learn that fact now.

Most all Americans are agreed now on the dangers of communism. Some of us have been concerned about communism for a long time. Our warnings and our efforts, such as my amendment to prevent post-war lend-lease from going to Russia and others, were ignored.

But now is not a time for recriminations. It is a time to carefully appraise our position and chart our course. The decision involves unlimited consequences. Our intentions do not matter. The consequences follow automatically.

To get a clear understanding of our present situation, we must go back a long way. When our leaders precipitated us into World War I, they thereby committed us to the one lasting consequence of that war. What was that consequence? The establishment of communism in full control of a powerful government—Russia.

NEW DEAL SPARKS COMMUNIST EXPANSION

Following this initial victory, we did not hear much about communism between 1921 and 1933. But when the New Deal took over in 1933, it was not long until Roosevelt gave communism a tremendous boost by official recognition.

This recognition enabled communism to begin to expand its activities, both in Europe and America. At that time the Communists were secretly promoting World War II. Finally Stalin's deal with Hitler precipitated the conflict.

When Hitler attacked Russia in 1941, Roosevelt immediately pledged the Communists unlimited materials from America, with no questions asked and no pledges made in return. Billions of our resources went to Russia. But Russia's hostility toward us never lessened. Many of our officials knew of this continuing hostility, but kept that fact from our people.

Many strange things happened. America's then No. 1 Communist, Earl Browder, was in the Federal penitentiary for violating our statutes. The New Deal pardoned him. All through the war the New Deal high command, both civilian and military, catered to Russia's every whim and every demand. War materials reportedly went to Russia ahead of the necessities of our own troops.

But she returned less in reverse lend-lease than we received from the Fiji Islands.

The Communists saw that the longer the war lasted the greater would be their victory. Accordingly, they cunningly insisted on the barbaric demand for unconditional surrender to prolong enemy resistance.

REAL WAR TRIUMPH WAS STALIN'S

When hostilities ceased, we had the momentary elation of a great military victory. But the real triumph was Stalin's—achieved with the aid of 400,000 Americans who died believing they were fighting for the Atlantic Charter.

Even after VJ-day, our foreign policy remained perfectly attuned to the wishes of the Kremlin. Using human distress in Europe as the bait, Communists promoted UNRRA, with Uncle Sam paying the bill.

Whatever the intentions were, UNRRA added to Stalin's conquests. Congress had been specifically warned that UNRRA would enable Stalin to extend his mastery over Europe. But the New Deal Congress, aided by the failure of the Republican leadership to explode this scheme, voted almost $3,000,000,000 of the savings of the American people for this arsenal of communism.

Our postwar policy in Germany also carried out the desires of the Kremlin. The Morgenthau plan and the official hate-the-German doctrine were Moscow approved and enabled the Communists to woo the German people. The New Deal party carried out Moscow's order.

NOVEMBER ELECTION FORCES CHANGE IN STRATEGY

Then last November a titanic ballot-box uprising took place in America. The American people demonstrated overwhelming opposition to a foreign and domestic policy which, knowingly or unwittingly, was following the Communist Party line.

So the conspirators in the Kremlin had to revise their strategy for world conquest. Let us visualize the reaction of the top Communists to our election. Stalin knew that direct handouts from America were over. He also knew that America was entirely too strong to challenge militarily; so what should he do in his unswerving objective of world domination?

Surely, Stalin would determine that he must reverse his tactics here to continue his conquests. Perhaps his mind would recall the famous prediction of Huey Long, who declared that "if fascism ever comes to America, it will come in the name of antifascism."

What better tactic could Stalin now develop than to promote communism in America in the name of anticommunism? This tactic, of course, would require the continual creation of communistic scares outside America.

Likewise, if he were to exhibit traditional Russian cunning, an historical Russian tactic would suggest itself to him. He would recall how Czar Alexander I sucked Napoleon into advancing to Moscow, and how that over-extended position so depleted Napoleon's strength that later he toppled easily at Waterloo.

Then Stalin might smile as he recalled Hitler's 1,500-mile supply line to Stalingrad. He would remember how the devouring logistics of that far-flung position decimated Hitler's military machine. So, Stalin would determine that he must keep America overextended and off balance.

AMERICA "OUT ON LIMB"

That would be the political strategy, just as it always has been a favored Russian tactic. He would needle us and play hit-and-run infiltration wherever America could be sucked in, especially remembering, of course, our continued willingness to aid the outposts of the British Empire.

This strategy would have another especial value to Mr. Stalin. With American attention on an external campaign against communism, his army of stooges in the New Deal could quickly be enrobed in a concealing mantle of anticommunism.

So, besides involving the American people in bankrupting commitments abroad, a communistic drive would divert suspicion and attention from Stalin's agents in the New Deal.

This scheme would make use of the tactics long used by subway pickpockets. Do you remember that trick? It was for one thief to concentrate the victim's attention by frontal shoving and jostling, while the thievery was carried out by the accomplice in the rear. He picked the pocket while the victim's attention was on the disturber in front of him. It is a simple trick, but Mr. Stalin has apparently been dealing with simple minds in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, it appears that the Communists have started this strategy, and that Mr. Truman and his advisers have been taken in. He proposes to send large amounts of military aid to Greece and Turkey. Most certainly we will apparently stabilize the situation there for awhile. Probably the Communists will fold their tents like the Arabs and silently steal away

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUFFETT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is the gentleman intimating that the Communists are going to quit?

Mr. BUFFETT. Oh, no; just wait until the next paragraph.

UNCLE SAM, INTERNATIONAL FIREMAN

Then after we have spread ourselves in Greece and Turkey, and our leaders are patting themselves on the back for their successful firm stand, a new alarm will come in. Communistic outbreaks will be reported serious in another area. We will rush to that alarm. A billion-dollar call will come from Korea. There will be renewed demands from China.

All over the world we would soon be answering alarms like an international fireman, maintaining garrisons, and pouring out our resources. Our position would become more over-extended than Hitler's was at the height of his conquests—if it is not already.

In the meantime, what will have happened at home? Economy plans will have generally gone up in smoke. The futility of then attempting to stop the reckless spenders, aided by the sly inside agents of the Kremlin, would quickly become apparent to all. In the pattern developed through the war years of deficit spending, this administration combination would dress up every spending scheme as vital in their anti-Communist program.

Attempts at economy would again be smeared as reactionary efforts to save dollars at the cost of the lives of American boys. Patriots who try to bring about economy would be branded as Stalin lovers.

The misery of the people, from continued militarism and inflation, would soon become unbearable. As their anguished protests became vocal, the shackles of regimentation and coercion, so lately thrown off, could be refastened in the name of stopping communism at home.

Of course, all this spending over the world will both make certain and hasten a financial collapse in America—an economic Pearl Harbor. That is the ultimate goal of the current Red needling.

INFLATION—COMMUNISM'S SECRET WEAPON

Stalin knows, as Lenin taught him, that the surest way to overturn an existing social order is to debauch the currency. When the President mentioned inflation in Greece, he unconsciously touched on the very condition which Stalin is counting on to give the communists victory in America.

And so, Mr. Speaker, if America is now sucked into a state of undeclared war in Greece and other places, we would seem to be paving the way for world triumph of communism. In World Wars I and II our noble objectives vanished when military victory was won. So it will be again if we take the road to war.

We will again learn too late the truth of William Graham Sumner's words:

When a war is begun, it will run its course and bring its consequences. What the intention was makes no difference.

PARTIAL LIST OF CONSEQUENCES

But, Mr. Speaker, we should consider now what some of the ultimate consequences would be. Here are a few of the probable results:

First. Truth-telling would generally disappear in radio, press, and movie. The totalitarian tactics of smear, censorship, and lying propaganda would overwhelm those who resist. Those Americans who correctly anticipated the communistic victory in World War II were politically crucified and silenced in most cases. The same terrorism will happen again if we are now maneuvered into thinly veiled armed conflict with Russia.

Second. Military conscription would soon be demanded to fill the ranks of garrisons for Palestine and the Near East oil fields.

Third. Laboring people would be in danger of a labor draft like President Truman wanted last May. As inflation mounted, class struggle, which the Communists have never yet been able to create in America, might rapidly develop. Every hidden force of inflation would be adding to the distress of the people—as far-flung military and economic operations exhausted our economy.

Fourth. OPA regimentation and coercion would be reimposed under the old forms or in some new sugar-coated version.

Fifth. GI benefits of World War II, when added to these new foreign handouts, would soon be an almost impossible financial load for the budget. Postponement by a moratorium, or serious dilution by inflation, could follow.

Sixth. Outstanding war bonds would probably be largely frozen in the hands of their owners.

Seventh. Within a few years our currency would become so diluted by inflation that it would have only a fraction of its 1939 purchasing power.

Eighth. Then the condition having been created here that Mr. Truman described in Greece of "savings wiped out by inflation," the people, beaten and bankrupt, would be ripe for a Communist dictatorship.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUFFETT. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. The gentleman is presenting a problem which we ought to consider very carefully. The gentleman spoke of the likelihood of a communistic dictatorship developing. Does the gentleman agree with me that the dictator might not be an American?

Mr. BUFFETT. Yes; that is entirely possible.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUFFETT. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Along the line of what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] was saying, we have not had an American foreign policy which originated here for 10 or 12 years.

Mr. BUFFETT. My remarks take recognition of that possibility.

Mr. HOFFMAN. As I got it, he, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] was suggesting that this dictator might come from abroad. My understanding is that our foreign policy has been coming from abroad through the British Empire for something like 10 years. If I am wrong, I would like to have the gentleman from Ohio correct me.

Mr. BUFFETT. As these consequences began to unfold, all effective political opposition would end. In fact, passage of this scheme, when added to the humbug Presidential campaigns of 1940 and 1944, might indicate that one-party Government has already been largely accomplished.

The smear terrorism long used by the New Deal would be directed against every patriot who resisted successive moves in this so-called anti-Communist drive.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Members of this House to think long and earnestly before they vote us into a probable Stalin trap—either the immediate one in Greece or later ones which may be skillfully concocted to get us out on a limb everywhere.

PROBABLY POLITICAL EXPEDIENCY HAS TEMPTED ADMINISTRATION

I am afraid the Truman high command has been tempted by the domestic political attractions abounding in this scheme. It seems to enable them at one stroke to apparently cast off their long-ingrained Communist taint and simultaneously shift the blame for 14 years of inflation.

This scheme would lay the inflation headache right in the laps of the Republicans. Truman could then say that the end of OPA, not the foreign hand-outs, brought skyrocketing price levels. The Republicans could not point out that excessive foreign hand-outs caused the inflation, because they would be recorded in favor of that policy. So the Balkan deal seems made to order to revive the New Deal domestically and likewise made to order for Stalin internationally.

Even if it were desirable, America is not strong enough to police the world by military force. If that attempt is made, the blessings of liberty will be replaced by coercion and tyranny at home.

Our Christian ideals cannot be exported to other lands by dollars and guns. Persuasion and example are the methods taught by the Carpenter of Nazareth, and if we believe in Christianity we should try to advance our ideals by His methods.

IMPERIALISM ABROAD AND FREEDOM AT HOME WILL NOT WORK

We cannot practice might and force abroad and retain freedom at home. We cannot talk world cooperation and practice power politics. If we try to face both ways at once, we will repeat the sad lesson of the Crusades. Ernest Barker summed up that tragedy in these words:

The Crusades may be written down as a failure. They ended not in the occupation of the east by the Christian west, but in the conquest of the west by the Mohammedan east.

Mr. Speaker, is the Truman administration truly trying to stop communism? Then its task begins at home. I suggest the same three-point program that I have long advocated, for a starter:

First. Clean out the Communists and the fellow travelers in our own Government.

Second. Stop giving foreign nations free economic support. End the administration policies that have used America as an arsenal for communism. Encourage genuine relief under nonpolitical auspices.

Third. Stop imitating communism. Communism arose out of the ashes of an economy destroyed by currency inflation and was welcomed by a people saddled with tyrannical bureaucracy. To stop communism we must balance the budget, reduce the debt, and cut taxes.

Mr. Speaker, long ago the admonition was offered "Physician, heal thyself." If the Truman administration is now finally interested in stopping the spread of communism, it will take to heart that specific advice from the Founder of the only effective antidote for communism, the Christian religion.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SADLAK asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. KEOGH asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a speech delivered by Senator MCMAHON, of Connecticut, at the annual banquet of the St. Patrick's Society at Brooklyn, St. George Hotel, last evening.

Mr. SHAFER asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. GAMBLE asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. BLATNIK asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial and a letter.

DEALING WITH COMMUNISTS SHOULD BEGIN AT HOME

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court yesterday upheld a court of appeals decision sustaining the right of the Civil Service Commission to discharge employees who follow the Communist Party line.

Now that the beliefs of the vast majority of the members of Congress have been fortified by judicial decision, it is the direct responsibility of the executive branch to adhere to the policy of discharging from the Federal pay roll all Communists and fellow travelers.

For several years I have been urging the Civil Service Commission to exercise its responsibility in these matters, but I have been confronted by evasions, excuses, and complete indifference.

Last year I asked the Civil Service Commission to review its cases to determine those on the Federal pay roll about whom there was reasonable doubt concerning their loyalty to the United States. This the Commission failed to do, based upon the confused legal theory that falsification of the loyalty oath was not a fraud.

Again I call upon the Civil Service Commission to review its cases and either discharge or report to the agency concerned all employees who are members of Communist organizations or about whom there is reasonable doubt concerning their loyalty.

This discussion brings me to report a recent example of negligence in connection with the hiring of disloyal Federal employees.

On February 14, 1947, my attention was called to a Federal employee who had been on the Federal pay roll since August 1, 1945, with the War Assets Administration. He was promoted from his entrance salary of $4,100 a year to $4,900 a year with the War Assets Administration and then transferred to the Department of Commerce. The Department of Commerce requested his transfer in order to employ him at $8,100 a year to go on a special mission to inspect chemical plants in Germany.

The information which came to me indicated that this employee was a follower of Communist doctrines and disloyal to the United States.

Accordingly, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of Commerce on February 20, 1947, which is as follows:

MY DEAR SECRETARY: My attention has been directed to the employment by the Commerce Department of Mr. ———, as a P–7 to inspect chemical plants in Germany.

Information in the possession of the committee indicates a serious doubt as to the loyalty of this employee, who began service with the Commerce Department on February 1, 1947. His record indicates clearly that a careful and thorough investigation should have been conducted of his character and loyalty before his employment with the Government.

I request that a thorough and intensive investigation of Mr. ———'s background, with particular reference to his loyalty to the United States, be made and that I be furnished a copy of such investigation before he is permitted to go abroad.

Sincerely,

EDWARD H. REES,
Chairman.

The Department of Commerce advised me that no further investigation of this employee has been contemplated, but upon the basis of my letter he would not be sent abroad until the Department had fully investigated the matter.

On March 5, 1947, the Department of Commerce advised that the employee had resigned his position.

During the interim I continued the investigation of this employee and disclosed the following information:

He was born on May 24, 1910, at Harbin, Manchuria, as Louis Hyman Levitsky. He registered at the City College of New York on January 27, 1931, and was suspended by the board of higher education on February 9, 1933, for participation in a mock trial where students protested the opposition of college President Robinson and Director Leninhan to the alleged Communist agitation going on at the college among the students. The suspension was for a period of 4 weeks and later on he was dropped from the rolls of the college permanently because of poor scholastic standing. Also included in the group of students suspended by the board of higher education was Joseph S. Starobin who is presently foreign editor of the Daily Worker. While attending the City College of New York, Levitsky was a member of the Liberal Club which was considered by its own faculty adviser as a group of young Communists whose activities and policies adhered rigidly to the Communist Party line and before which Earl Browder and Mike Gold made speeches.

His parents are signers of the 1943 Communist Party petition.

Statements made about him and his family indicate a background of communism dating back to the Russian revolution. During this time the White Russians drove Levitsky's family out of Russia to Manchuria where he was born. Relatives of Levitsky are said to be officials in local Soviets of the present Russian Government.

A photostatic copy of his application for employment with the War Assets Administration which is duplicated in the files of the Commerce Department, shows that he was born in Harbin, China, May 24, 1910. In answer to the question regarding loyalty he stated that he was loyal to the United States. Also, on his application, he stated that he had no relatives living in foreign countries.

Assuming that these answers on his application are insufficient to raise a question as to whether he should be investigated before employment with the Federal Government, it certainly is reasonable to expect that the Department of Commerce would investigate the background, character, and loyalty of every employee it sends abroad, particularly upon such important missions.

The seriousness of this personnel action is emphasized by the fact that this man was not to perform routine duties but was to represent the United States Government in the examination of chemical establishments in Germany. These industrials have a direct effect upon Germany's war potential and they have been the subject of requisition by Communist-dominated countries.

The case raises many questions in my mind because it occurred at the very time when the President's committee to investigate loyalty among Government employees was reporting its findings to the President.

My investigation also revealed that the War Assets Administration conducted a superficial investigation of this man in December 1946 while he was employed with that agency, and none of the facts which I have found bearing upon his loyalty to this country were uncovered during that investigation. In fact, the investigation by the War Assets Administration indicated that there was no reason why he could not be promoted to a higher position for which he was then being considered.

Under the present policy of the Civil Service Commission delegating authority to the various departments and agencies, this man could be appointed to a position with the Federal Government in Florida without any question being raised concerning his loyalty to the United States.

My question is, How many other cases are there like this, and how many other employees are being sent on confidential missions to Europe who have not been investigated thoroughly?

It seems clear that if this could happen once it could happen many times. The files of the Civil Service Commission contain many investigations which have established reasonable doubt as to the loyalty of employees who are now on the Federal pay roll, but the Commission has, in my opinion, neglected its responsibility of advising the departments and agencies of the presence of this type of person in the Federal pay roll.

To allow people with subversive views to remain on the public pay roll is unfair to the thousands of loyal, patriotic career employees in Government. Not only that, but it is manifestly unfair to the Government and to the people of this country to permit people with foreign ideologies to be employed in the public service. The people of this country are entitled to the services of people whose loyalties are not questioned. They are also entitled to be protected from people with subversive views and activities.

In the near future I hope our committee may conduct an extensive investigation into the matter of loyalty of Federal employees. However, legislation is not the entire solution to the problem. There is no question but that the executive branch has ample authority now fortified by a Supreme Court decision to eliminate all disloyal employees who are on the Federal pay roll. It is not just a question of funds or appropriations which prevents these persons from being removed. It is the neglect or indifference on the part of some of our responsible officials.

SENATE BILL REFERRED

A bill of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. Con. Res. 9. Concurrent resolution to print for the use of the Committee on Finance additional copies of Senate Report No. 610, Seventy-sixth Congress, entitled "Survey of Experience of Incentive Taxation"; to the Committee on House Administration.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Thursday, March 20, 1947, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

462. A letter from the Acting Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill requesting an appropriation in the aggregate amount of $54,036.69 providing for the relief of certain officers and employees of the Foreign Service of the United States who sustained losses by reasons of conditions prevailing in the world during recent years; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

463. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill to amend section 2 of the act prescribing regulations for the Soldiers' Home located at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. 564; 24 U. S. C. 60); to the Committee on Armed Services.

464. A letter from the Secretary of Interior, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill authorizing the adjudication of claims of persons of Japanese ancestry against the United States for losses arising out of the evacuation or exclusion of such persons by the War Department from the west coast, Alaska, and Hawaii during World War II; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

465. A letter from the Archivist of the United States, transmitting a list or schedules or parts of lists or schedules covering records proposed for disposal by various Government agencies; to the Committee on House Administration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 148. Resolution to provide for the consideration of the bill, H. R. 2413, to amend the Federal Reserve Act, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 162). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 149. Resolution to provide for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 146, to extend the powers and authorities under certain statutes with respect to the distribution and pricing of sugar, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 163). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GRAHAM: Committee on the Judiciary. H. R. 1999. A bill to authorize additional allowances of good time and the payment of compensation to prison inmates performing exceptionally meritorious or outstanding services; without amendment (Rept. No. 164). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

By Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey:

H. Res. 152. Resolution providing further expenses of conducting the studies and investigations authorized by clause 1 (Q) of rule XI incurred by the Committee on Un-American Activities; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. WOLVERTON:

H. Res. 153. Resolution to continue the authority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the transportation situation; to the Committee on Rules.

MEMORIALS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, memorials were presented and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to preserve public lands in Idaho in their present ownership status; to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of California, memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States relative to centralized purchasing for Navy ship's service stores; to the Committee on Armed Services.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. COUDERT:

H. R. 2628. A bill for the relief of Victor A. Kravchenko; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H. R. 2629. A bill for the relief of Emanuel Carinos; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. D'EWART:

H. R. 2630. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Christine West and Mrs. Jesse West; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KEE:

H. R. 2631. A bill for the relief of Charles F. Barrett; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LESINSKI:

H. R. 2632. A bill for the relief of Vasilios Demiris, alias Vasil Georgieff Demiroff; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MONRONEY:

H. R. 2633. A bill for the relief of Claude T. Thomas, legal guardian of Elizabeth Ann Mervine, a minor, and the estates of Mary L. Poole, deceased, and Hazel S. Thomas, deceased; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PETERSON:

H. R. 2634. A bill for the relief of the Tampa Chapter, No. 113, United Daughters of the Confederacy; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEVENSON:

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 7 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

221 By Mr. WELCH: California State Senate Joint Resolution No. 1, relating to memorializing the Congress of the United States, in considering and acting upon the budget, to give due consideration to the need and necessity of a strong national defense and adequate Naval and Military Establishments; to the Committee on Appropriations.

222. By Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin: Resolution adopted by the Holstein-Friesian Association of Wisconsin at Fond du Lac, Wis., February 25, 1947, asking that all controls be removed, that the fixing of tariffs be left entirely to congressional action, that this country stop borrowing money from its citizens to lend to other countries, and that the need for agricultural machinery in this country be adequately supplied before shipping it to other countries; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 19, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 19, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord Jesus, Thou who art the way, the truth, and the life, hear us as we pray for the truth that shall make men free. Teach us that liberty is not only to be loved, but also to be lived. Liberty is too precious a thing to be buried in books. It cost too much to be hoarded. Make us to see that our liberty is not the right to do as we please, but the opportunity to please to do what is right. So may America, through Thy servants, the Members of this body, do what is right, that Thy blessing can rest upon their labors, and give them good conscience. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, March 18, 1947, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Swanson, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 17) authorizing the printing of additional copies of House Document No. 754, Seventy-ninth Congress, entitled "Communism in Action."

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 173. An act to authorize the sale of certain public land in Alaska to Victory Bible Camp Ground, Inc.;

H. R. 326. An act for the relief of Wilma E. Baker;

H. R. 348. An act for the relief of Dr. Alma Richards and Mrs. Mary Block;

H. R. 360. An act for the relief of the legal guardian of Francis Eugene Hardin, a minor;

H. R. 364. An act for the relief of W. H. Baker and Walter Baker;

H. R. 428. An act for the relief of Charles N. Bemis;

H. R. 444. An act for the relief of the estate of Archie S. Woods, deceased;

H. R. 555. An act for the relief of Edna Rita Saffron Fidone;

H. R. 620. An act for the relief of Blanche E. Broad;

H. R. 621. An act for the relief of Vera Frances Elicker;

H. R. 811. An act for the relief of J. F. Powers;

H. R. 1288. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant a private right-of-way to Roscoe L. Wood;

H. R. 1494. An act for the relief of the estate of Nellie P. Dunn, deceased;

H. R. 2094. An act for the relief of Isaac B. Jones; and

H. R. 2535. An act to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the sessions of the Senate the Committee on Finance may conduct hearings tomorrow, the remainder of the present week, and, if necessary, through the following week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the order is made.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Banking and Currency Committee may sit tomorrow afternoon while the Senate is in session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the order is made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be absent from the Senate on March 20 and 21.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

EXTENSION OF SPECIFIED PARTS OF SECOND WAR POWERS ACT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my message to the Congress on January 31, 1947, concerning the extension of specified parts of the Second War Powers Act, I stated that it was desirable to delay any communication on the subject of the control of this country's exports until it became clear whether or not an extension of such controls would be necessary beyond June 30, 1947.

Further review of domestic and world supplies has now convinced me that this Government must continue its control over the export of products in critically short supply here and abroad, in order to protect the economy of the United States, as well as to discharge our international responsibilities. The situation, although essentially temporary in character, will certainly remain acute for some time to come.

As a result of the war, many nations have been stripped of essential supplies and their productive capacity has been curtailed. Foreign demands for these supplies are therefore extremely large. Prices of many commodities in other countries are far above present levels in the United States. Uncontrolled exports of food products would result in a marked increase in the already substantial burden of living costs borne by the American people. Unlimited export of feeds, seeds, and fertilizers would make extremely difficult the achievement of the food-production goals which we have asked American farmers to meet and would increase the cost of production of farm products.

This country is the great undamaged center of industrial production to which the whole world looks for materials of every kind. Our steel, lumber, building materials, industrial chemicals, and many other basic industrial commodities are sought throughout the world. Shortages of many of these commodities restrict our own domestic production of other essential products. Unrestrained export would inevitably limit the level of our own industrial production and employment. Furthermore, there are instances in which we wish to direct exports to those countries which produce commodities essential to our own economy. Thus, limited amounts of equipment have been directed to certain countries to increase the production of tin, hard fibers, sugar, and fats and oils.

Serious as would be the effect of unlimited and completely undirected exports upon a Nation still troubled by many shortages, our domestic problems are not the only ones which lead me to urge upon the Congress a further extension of export controls. The United States has become a Nation with world-wide responsibilities. During a period of world shortages, the distribution of this country's exports has serious international significance. If we retain the ability to channel commercial exports of critically scarce materials, we can permit export of these products to countries whose need is greatest while still protecting the United States from excessive export drains. Our international responsibilities cannot be fulfilled without this machinery. In its absence, foreign purchasing would tend to be concentrated on those commodities in greatest world shortage. Not only would our domestic supply and price structure be seriously affected, but the commodities would go to destinations where the need is comparatively less pressing.

Furthermore, we have granted loans and other monetary aid to nations whose existence must be preserved. These loans will accomplish their purpose only if the recipient nations are able to obtain critically needed supplies from this country. Export control is an important instrument in carrying out the purpose of these loan programs.

The record clearly shows that this authority over exports has been exercised in the past only with respect to those commodities in critically short supply and that, as rapidly as the supply situation has improved, commodities have been removed from control. The list of items subject to export control has been reduced from a wartime peak of over 3,000 to approximately 725 on October 1, 1946, and approximately 500 at the present time. We will continue to remove export controls as rapidly as the supply situation permits. I look forward to the day when the United States and other countries can remove these interferences to the free flow of commodities in world trade. But the danger of immediate and complete decontrol in the face of continuing domestic and world scarcities is too great for this Nation to undertake at this time.

I therefore, recommend that the authority derived from the Export Control Act be extended for a period of 1 year beyond its present expiration date, June 30, 1947. It is essential that this extension be made well in advance of this date. Delay would prove unsettling to business and would handicap the planning and execution of our food and other export programs. Effective administration of the export control orders requires the assurance of continuity in operations. I urge upon the Congress prompt action in extending this authority.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 19, 1947.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the message will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in view of the message from the President which has just been read it is perfectly obvious that many products involving agriculture are covered, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the message be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, a copy of the President's message will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

RELIEF OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE FOREIGN SERVICE

A letter from the Acting Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation for the relief of certain officers and employees of the Foreign Service of the United States who, while in the course of their respective duties, suffered losses of personal property by reason of war conditions (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TRANSFER BY NAVY DEPARTMENT OF NAVAL MOTOR LAUNCHES TO CITY OF OAKLAND, CALIF.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, reporting, pursuant to law, that the city of Oakland, Calif., had requested the Navy Department to transfer three naval motor launches for use by the recreation department of that city; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EVACUATION CLAIMS COMMISSION

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to create an Evacuation Claims Commission under the general supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, and to provide for the powers, duties, and functions thereof, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

A letter from the Archivist of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of papers and documents on the files of several departments and agencies of the Government which are not needed in the conduct of business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and requesting action looking to their disposition (with accompanying papers); to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Papers in the Executive Departments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. LANGER and Mr. CHAVEZ members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 1

"Joint resolution relative to centralized purchasing for Navy ships service stores

"Whereas under a policy put into effect in 1946 by the Navy Department all Navy ships service stores are now compelled to buy through a centralized Navy purchasing office in New York City; and

"Whereas the effect of this new policy is to deprive the wholesale distributors of the business they formerly engaged in and to create a new bureaucracy in a field formerly competently served by private enterprise; and

"Whereas private enterprise through taxes paid by it will furnish the capital for the operation of this new system and at the same time will be rendered less able to pay taxes by reason of its operation; and

"Whereas there is widespread dissatisfaction among naval personnel over the quality of merchandise available to them as a result of such centralized purchasing; and

"Whereas this has resulted in a reduction of the profits from naval ships service stores formerly available for welfare purposes: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to return to wholesale distributors that function which they so competently performed and to eliminate centralized purchasing for ships service stores from the Navy Department; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is hereby directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the President pro tempore of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, and to the Secretary of the Navy."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, memorializing Congress to preserve public lands in Idaho in their present ownership status; to the Committee on Public Lands.

(See joint memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. DWORSHAK on March 18, 1947, p. 2171, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of legislation to open for homestead entry the submarginal lands in the State of North Dakota for the benefit and rehabilitation of veterans of World War II; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. YOUNG on March 17, 1947, p. 2105, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of legislation to provide funds for the payment of the difference between the ceiling price on flax and the price obtainable after the ceiling had been lifted; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. YOUNG on March 17, 1947, p. 2106, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of legislation to maintain a floor of not less than 90 percent of parity on all basic farm crops; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. YOUNG on March 17, 1947, p. 2106, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of legislation to strengthen present sanitary requirements governing the importation of livestock and livestock products and to appropriate additional funds to the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, in order that border inspection may be improved and a system of patrol established along the northern boundary of Mexico to guard against the importation of people, animals, and materials carrying the infection of foot-and-mouth disease; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. YOUNG on March 17, 1947, p. 2106, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of legislation to propose an amendment to the Constitution providing equal rights for women; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. YOUNG on March 17, 1947, p. 2104, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of legislation to extend the time for availability of funds under the Federal Aid Act of 1944; to the Committee on Public Works.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. YOUNG on March 17, 1947, p. 2104, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of legislation barring all forms of liquor advertising from interstate mails, radio, and motion-picture programs; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. YOUNG on March 17, 1947, p. 2104, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of legislation to create a Roosevelt Memorial Park in the Bad Lands area of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Public Lands.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. YOUNG on March 17, 1947, p. 2105, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of House bill 1113 of the Eightieth Congress, authorizing the removal of restrictions by the Government on land and land interests of Indian veterans; to the Committee on Public Lands.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. YOUNG on March 17, 1947, p. 2105, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

By Mr. MORSE:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Senate Joint Memorial 2

"To the Honorable Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress Assembled:

"We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent and petition as follows:

"Whereas under existing general law all appropriations for the purchase of national forest lands in the several States are provided by the Congress of the United States, and each such acquisition is conditioned upon the consent of the State in which said property to be acquired is situated; and

"Whereas in the year 1922 the Congress further provided that the United States Forest Service, without congressional appropriation or review, has the right to appropriate so much of the annual timber crop from the national forests as it desires to use for the purpose of acquiring additional real property through the method of granting timber-cutting rights in the national forests in exchange for deeds to private property of equal value; and

"Whereas, by means of such method, the United States of America, acting by and through the Forest Service, has acquired in the State of Oregon in excess of 1,000,000 acres of land, without the prior approval of the Congress or of the State, which method of expending the public wealth is not only against the public interest, but is impairing the tax structures of the units of local government in the rural sections of the State, in that every such acquisition defeats the purpose of title 16, United States Code, Annotated, section 500, which provides that 25 percent of the gross receipts of the several national forests shall be paid to local governmental units in lieu of taxes, and that each such acquisition also reduces the property-tax base of one or more units of local government, and consequently increases the taxes necessarily levied by the taxing agencies thereby affected: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the House of Representatives jointly concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be and it hereby is memorialized, and this forty-fourth legislative assembly of the State of Oregon does hereby petition the Congress to repeal title 16, United States Code, Annotated, section 485, and so much of title 16, United States Code, Annotated, section 516, as may be necessary to restrict the acquisition of national forest lands solely to such lands as may be acquired by appropriations of money from the Federal Treasury; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit copies of this memorial to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative therein, representing the people of the State of Oregon."

RESOLUTIONS OF CLAY COUNTY (S. DAK.) FARMERS' UNION

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for printing in the RECORD and appropriate reference two resolutions adopted by the Clay County Farmers Union of South Dakota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolutions will be received, printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

To the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"Resolution 1

"Whereas the plight of landlocked States became further aggravated by reason of the Panama Canal, which brought water-borne commerce rates into competition with transcontinental rail shipments, as a result of which there followed reduced transcontinental rail rates and increased rail rates from either coast to interior points and between interior points, resulting in population gains along the seaboards and depopulation of landlocked States suffering from high freight rates and inadequate transportation service; and

"Whereas railroads exacting confiscatory rates for bad service are resisting Missouri River navigation; and

"Whereas the Minneapolis private grain trade fearing diversion of grain from Minneapolis to down-stream markets has taken a stand against navigation; and

"Whereas South Dakota is in a high-cost electric-power-producing area due to the local availability of neither oil nor suitable clay for electric-power production; and

"Whereas private electric-power companies have conducted a campaign of contradiction, confusion, and obstruct transmission of electric power to consumers at cost. Contradictory propaganda calculated to throttle production of electricity has followed these two patterns: (1) Only enough electric power can be generated to pump water out of the river for irrigation; (2) electric-power potentialities are so enormous as to make maximum production unnecessary and extravagantly wasteful; and

"Whereas the Pick-Sloan plan, designed to impound floodwaters in the upper reaches of the Missouri River back of a series of mud dams without lock systems for navigation, holds no definite assurance of electric-power production beyond the amount required to pump water out of the river for irrigation to which it grants priority; and

"Whereas the Pick-Sloan combination seeks to return agriculture to prewar economic conditions by solving problems which do not exist and by ignoring problems which do exist—by emphasizing irrigation and by excluding navigation and by producing only an undetermined amount of electric energy with whatever water is left after saturating 5,000,000 acres of land to artificially produce more food to further aggravate an already threatened overproduction before completion of the projects; and

"Whereas approximately 75 percent of the power-generating sites on the main stem of the Missouri River are located in South Dakota from which points electric power could be successfully transmitted to all parts of our State, and long-distance transmission lines could deliver electricity to rural and urban consumers in other valley States which would require maximum production to the last kilowatt; and

"Whereas the pressing need in landlocked raw-material States is navigation plus an abundance of low-cost electric power to diversify our economy, promote industry, create a home market for farm products and to conserve coal and oil; and

"Whereas this Nation, confronted with the possibility of an atomic race involving all major nations necessitates maximum power generation and inland navigation to serve defense plants located in the interior: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the farmers at this county meeting at Vermillion, S. Dak., this 10th day of March 1947, That we reject irrigation priority; denounce Pick-Sloan mud dams without lock systems; and disapprove of electric power limitations; be it further

"Resolved, That we propose to attain our objective by unequivocally supporting impoundment of floodwaters back of a series of indestructible, reinforced, multipurpose, concrete dams in the upper reaches of the Missouri River, with maximum power generating facilities; lock installations for navigation; surplus water for irrigation where feasible; and transmission of current to all consumers in valley States at cost with decentralized administrative authority; be it still further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to South Dakota Senators and Congressmen."

To the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Resolution 2

"Whereas Congress by the Steagall amendment pledged the Government to support the price of farm products at not less than 90 percent of parity until the expiration of the 2-year period beginning with the first of January immediately following official termination of hostilities; and

"Whereas the Honorable Clinton Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture, has nullified this sacred 90 percent of parity pledge relative to the support price on eggs, by reading into the pledge a double rule of national and annual average price which is foreign to the Steagall amendment and has the effect of allowing 10-cent egg prices without support if the national or annual average price equals or exceeds 90 percent of parity; and

"Whereas application of the Anderson interpretation of the Steagall amendment to other supported farm commodities would permit 2-cent hog prices without support if the average national or average annual price were equal to or higher than 90 percent of parity: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the members of Clay County Farmers Union in attendance at this county meeting at Vermillion, S. Dak., this 10th day of March 1947, That we denounce the Anderson interpretation of the Steagall amendment as a gross miscarriage of justice and urge our Senators and Congressmen to exercise their influence to compel the Secretary of Agriculture to abide by the Steagall amendment without reading something into it which is not there; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to our Washington delegation consisting of GURNEY, BUSHFIELD, MUNDT, and CASE."

LABOR-MANAGEMENT COOPERATION

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, in these times of labor and management relationship discussions within and without the Senate, in these times when we face situations such as that called to our attention by my colleague [Mr. MORSE] yesterday afternoon, it is refreshing to find here and there throughout the United States active cooperative efforts between management and labor resulting in peace on the management-labor front.

In my own State of Oregon, which has an enviable reputation for cooperative action between labor and management, there has been established for some time past a labor management committee which has functioned in a most successful manner in the settlement of labor-management disputes in that area. Recently that committee made a declaration of policy for industrial peace, which I desire at this time to read into the RECORD:

DECLARATION OF POLICY FOR INDUSTRIAL PEACE

The officers and board of directors of Portland Labor-Management Committee unanimously endorse a policy of labor and management working together with a true spirit of cooperation to preserve industrial peace and the American way of life and hereby declare—

That the basic principle of free enterprise supported by collective bargaining must be the determining factor to guide labor and management to a full understanding of their responsibility;

That equitable wages and fair profits are essential to a stable economy and are an integral part of establishing confidence and mutual understanding between labor and management;

That maintaining agreements is a sacred trust of labor and management;

That labor and management pledge to their community and State help and assistance to meet the human and economic needs of its people and also their social, educational, moral, and spiritual problems;

That we pledge to labor and industry and the public who wish to locate in our area this program to insure continuous production by maintaining industrial peace.

PORTLAND LABOR-MANAGEMENT COMMITTEE
(By its officers and board of directors).

Dated at Portland, Oreg., this 5th day of March 1947.

I feel, Mr. President, that this declaration may well be adopted as a charter between labor and management throughout the Nation; I am sure such action would conduce in great degree to general industrial peace.

DAYLIGHT SAVING IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received a letter from William H. Press, executive secretary of the Washington Board of Trade, appealing to me to support S. 736, which sets up a daylight-saving program for the District of Columbia. I am in favor of this legislation and I ask unanimous consent to present the letter from the Washington Board of Trade and request that it be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter was received, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON BOARD OF TRADE,
Washington, D. C., March 15, 1947.

MY DEAR SENATOR: A favorable report on S. 736 will be placed before the Senate sometime next week. I believe you will appreciate the following information about the bill.

In voting for Senator MCGRATH'S bill you will not cast a vote for daylight saving time. It merely empowers the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to establish daylight-saving time in the District during the spring and summer of 1947 if a public hearing demonstrates that local citizens want it. We believe that the Commissioners should have the power that this bill will grant.

The Washington Board of Trade, and we are convinced the overwhelming majority of organizations and citizens, want daylight-saving time in the District of Columbia this year. Eighty-two percent of the principal civic and business organizations polled by the junior board of commerce favor it. Four thousand four hundred and sixty-one out of six thousand six hundred and four citizens favored it in a straw ballot conducted by the Times-Herald. A substantial majority of citizens favored daylight-saving time in a sample survey conducted by the Washington Post. The American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans' and the American Veterans' Committee also want daylight-saving time. Notices appearing in the public press have clearly shown an extraordinarily vigorous local desire for summer daylight-saving time.

Business clearly wants daylight-saving time. Baltimore, Annapolis, and other communities in Maryland this year will move their clocks back. This means that practically all the principal communities and some entire States north of Washington along the Atlantic coast and west to Chicago will change their time. This is the area with which we maintain closest business ties. If we stay on standard time that means there will be confusion for travelers and lost time in the length of the business day of banks, financial institutions, and all business houses engaged in interstate commerce. Since the principal radio networks and news services change their clocks, we would have dislocation, lost time, and added expense in making necessary adjustments.

The great mass of people in Washington, including Federal workers, know that daylight-saving time will permit an extra hour of daylight for recreation, gardening, and other healthful, body-building activities.

We hope you will vote for S. 736 and thereby give Washingtonians an opportunity to convince the Commissioners that they want daylight-saving time, with the knowledge that the Commissioners can carry out their wishes.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM H. PRESS,
Executive Secretary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

S. 350. A bill to continue the Commodity Credit Corporation as an agency of the United States until June 30, 1948; with amendments (Rept. No. 58); and

S. 669. A bill to provide for the payment of a bonus of 30 cents per bushel on wheat and corn produced and sold between January 1, 1945, and April 18, 1946; without amendment (Rept. No. 59).

By Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. 874. A bill to authorize the President to appoint Lt. Comdr. Paul A. Smith as alternate representative of the United States to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor, and as representative of the United States to the Air Navigation Committee of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization, without affecting his status and perquisites as an officer of the Coast and Geodetic Survey; without amendment (Rept. No. 60);

S. 875. A bill to authorize the President to appoint Maj. Gen. Laurence S. Kuter as representative of the United States to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor, without affecting his military status and perquisites; without amendment (Rept. No. 61); and

S. J. Res. 86. Joint resolution to authorize Herschel V. Johnson, Deputy Representative of the United States to the Security Council of the United Nations, to be reappointed to the Foreign Service; without amendment (Rept. No. 62).

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of John Wesley Thompson Falkner IV, of Mississippi, to be United States marshal for the northern district of Mississippi, vice Ira Lamar Morgan, term expired, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

(Mr. LODGE introduced Senate Joint Resolution 91, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the election of the President and the Vice President, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and appears under a separate heading.)

AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION RELATING TO ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, proposing a constitutional amendment to provide for the popular election of the President and Vice President of the United States. I first introduced this resolution on January 31, 1941, using as my text the resolution which has been consistently introduced in the House. The resolution I introduce now is the same as the one I introduced in 1941.

Only by providing for the popular election of President and Vice President can we avoid the very dangerous possibilities which are inherent in our present system, whereby an obsolete electoral college makes possible the election of a man as President who has not received a majority or plurality of the popular vote. Clearly, this is a matter of sufficient importance to warrant the careful consideration by the Congress and presentation to the people for such action as they desire in bringing up to date the basic framework of their Government.

I request that the joint resolution be appropriately referred, and that a statement, which I made in 1941 and which I have revised and brought up to date, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and without objection, the statement presented by the Senator from Massachusetts will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 91) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the election of the President and the Vice President, introduced by Mr. LODGE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the statement presented by Mr. LODGE was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The men who sat in Philadelphia during the long hot summer of 1787 were perplexed about many things, but there was one intricate problem which puzzled them especially. This was the problem of how to choose a President of the United States. The method of choosing Senators and Representatives was a simpler matter, because the States were in existence; they were truly going concerns. The Central Government, however, was still only on paper. It was a dream. Although the Convention was composed for the most part of men of conservative views, there were many differences of opinion as to how the President should be chosen.

Some thought he should be chosen by the legislative branch. Mr. Gouverneur Morris, however, we read in the record of the Federal Convention, was pointedly against his being so chosen. He will be the mere creature of the Legislature if appointed and impeachable by that body. He ought to be elected by the people at large, by the freeholders of the country. That difficulties attend this mode he admits. But they have been found superable in New York and in Connecticut and would, he believed, be found so in the case of an Executive for the United States. If the people should elect, they will never fail to prefer some man of distinguished character or services; some man, if he might so speak, of continental reputation. If the Legislature elect, it will be the work of intrigue, of cabal, and of faction.

Mr. Madison held that "there are objections against every mode that has been, or perhaps can be, proposed. The election must be made either by some existing authority under the National or State Constitutions, or by some special authority derived from the people, or by the people themselves. The two existing authorities under the National Constitution would be the legislative and judiciary. The latter, he presumed, was out of the question; the former, in his judgment, liable to insuperable objections. Besides the general influence of that mode on the independence of the Executive: 1. The election of the Chief Magistrate would agitate and divide the Legislature so much that the public interest would materially suffer by it. Public bodies are always apt to be thrown into contentions, but into more violent ones by such occasions than by any others. 2. The candidate would intrigue with the Legislature, would derive his appointment from the predominant faction and be apt to render his administration subservient to its views. 3. The ministers of foreign powers would have and make use of the opportunity to mix their intrigues and influence with the election. Limited as the powers of the Executive are, it will be an object of great moment with the great rival powers of Europe who have American possessions, to have at the head of our Government a man attached to their respective politics and interests. No pains, nor perhaps expense, will be spared to gain from the Legislature an appointment favorable to their wishes. Germany and Poland are witnesses of this danger. In the former the election of the head of the Empire, till it became in a manner hereditary, interested all Europe and was much influenced by foreign interference—in the latter, although the elective magistrate has very little real power, his election has at all times produced the most eager interference of foreign princes, and has, in fact, at length slid entirely into foreign hands.

"The option before us then lay between an appointment by electors chosen by the people and an immediate appointment by the people. He thought the former mode free from many of the objections which had been urged against it, and greatly preferable to an appointment by the National Legislature. As the electors would be chosen for the occasion, would meet at once, and proceed immediately to an appointment, there would be very little opportunity for cabal or corruption. As a further precaution, it might be required that they should meet at some place distinct from the seat of Government, and even that no person within a certain distance of the place at the time should be eligible. This mode, however, had been rejected so recently and by so great a majority that it probably would not be proposed anew.

"The remaining mode was an election by the people, or rather by the qualified part of them, at large. With all its imperfections, he liked this best. He would not repeat either the general arguments for or the objections against this mode. He would only take notice of two difficulties which he admitted to have weight. The first arose from the disposition in the people to prefer a citizen of their own State, and the disadvantage this would throw on the smaller States. Great as this objection might be, he did not think it equal to such as lay against every other mode which had been proposed. He thought, too, that some expedient might be hit upon that would obviate it. The second difficulty arose from the disproportion of qualified voters in the Northern and Southern States, and the disadvantages which this mode would throw on the latter.

"The answer to this objection was: 1. That this disproportion would be continually decreasing under the influence of the Republican laws introduced in the Southern States, and the more rapid increase of their population. 2. That local considerations must give way to the general interest. As an individual from the Southern States, he was willing to make the sacrifice."

Rufus King, speaking in the United States Senate on March 20, 1816, recalled that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution "the opinion had been that all undue agency or influence was entirely guarded against; that the men selected by the people from their own body would give their votes in such a manner so that no opportunity would be afforded for a combination, to change the freedom and popular character which naturally belonged to the electoral bodies. Such had been the idea of the Nation at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. "We know," said he "the course which this thing has taken.

"The election of a President of the United States is no longer that process which the Constitution contemplated. In conformity with the original view of the authors of that instrument, I would restore, as thoroughly as possible, the freedom of election to the people. * * * It was with the people the Constitution meant to place the election of the Chief Magistrate, that being the source least liable to be corrupt."

Others at the Convention who favored electing the President by popular vote were Benjamin Franklin and Charles Carroll.

The final result, of course, was the creation of the electoral college. The reason for it was given by Alexander Hamilton in the following language:

"It was equally desirable that the immediate election should be made by men most capable of analyzing the qualities adapted to the station and acting under circumstances favorable to deliberation and to a judicious combination of all the reasons and inducements that were proper to govern their choice. A small number of persons elected by their fellow citizens from the general mass will be most likely to possess the information and discernment requisite to so complicated an investigation."

This brings up a picture of a meeting of impartial people, each using his own judgment, to find the best man for President.

This is what Alexander Hamilton said that the electoral college was supposed to be. Actually it has never worked that way. The electors became automatons, exercising no discretion at all, and a whole set of defects came into existence which had been neither foreseen nor approved by the framers of the Constitution. At least eight defects in the system as it exists today are to be noted.

UNIT RULE

First is the unit rule, which runs roughshod over minorities. This rule makes a campaign in any State a gamble, it is all or nothing. Even though Cleveland eked out a meager 1,149-vote victory in the great State of New York over Blaine in 1884, he received all the 36 electoral votes from that State. In no State where President Roosevelt received a majority in the 1944 election was a single Dewey vote counted in the final reckoning. In no State where Dewey received a majority was a single Roosevelt vote counted in the final reckoning. Not only were they not counted, they were really misappropriated. In the final count the winner receives credit for millions of votes which were actually cast against him. On the basis of popular vote, Mr. Roosevelt should have been credited with 286 electoral votes, and Mr. Dewey with 245. Actually the count stood—Roosevelt, 432; Dewey, 99. The extra 146 votes which the winner received came from the loser.

The unit vote, as Congressman CLARENCE F. LEA has pointed out, "was a method adopted by the dominating political party in each State to prevent the minority parties in the State from having any voice in the selection of the President. This effort of dominant political parties to prevent minorities in the State from having a voice in the selection of a President was intense preceding the election of 1800 and subsequently developed into a universal practice.

"The Tammany victory in New York in the spring of 1800 and the victory of the Jefferson party in Pennsylvania forecast the election of Jefferson unless the system of selecting Presidential electors should be changed.

"The Federal leaders sought to forestall the election of Jefferson by bringing about a deadlock in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and thus prevent the people of Pennsylvania from having any voice in the election. They sought to change the system of selecting electors in New York from the general to the district system of election in order that Adams might secure part of the electoral votes of New York instead of Jefferson securing them all.

"The Legislature of New Hampshire took away the right of the people to select their Presidential electors and chose Federalist electors. In the election that followed the Jefferson State ticket won by a popular vote of 10 to 6, but the electors chosen by the legislature all voted for Adams.

"In Massachusetts the Federalist Legislature did away with the district system of selecting electors and caused them to be selected by general ticket to prevent Jefferson securing any of the electors.

"In Virginia the general assembly did away with the district system of election and provided for the general ticket system in order to eliminate the possibility of Adams securing any electoral votes in Virginia.

"In 1812, within about 1 week of election, the Legislature of New Jersey took away from the people the right to vote for Presidential electors, and selected the electors in order to prevent the opposition party from securing any electors from that State.

"Thus the origin of the unit-voting system was a deliberate purpose to deny all minorities a voice in the selection of a President."

One perversion of the original system led to another. Madison, for example, who had always opposed the unit vote, urged Virginia in 1800 to adopt it as a matter of defense against the opponents of Jefferson in other States.

It was also true that the people distrusted a delegate who was in no way bound. They were suspicious that a few delegates might, in a close contest, be in the position of dictating the choice. They turned to a system of pledged electors, and when that was done, as Mr. LEA says, "the reason for Presidential electors disappeared."

The result is that within a State a candidate gets all or nothing, and the voter's vote is counted on the winning side, whether he voted that way or not. He gets less than nothing.

The House report (No. 262, 73d Cong., 1st sess.) gives this compilation:

"For instance, in 1928, Mr. Hoover had less than 50 percent of the vote of the State of New York; Mr. Smith had nearly 47 percent. Yet Mr. Hoover received the whole 45 electoral votes of New York.

"In 1912 Wilson received 42 percent of the popular vote of the United States and 82 percent of the electoral vote. In 1924 Coolidge carried 12 States by minority votes, which gave him 86 electoral votes.

"In 1924 John W. Davis as candidate for President received 6,000,000 votes that brought him no electoral vote. Six million people went to the polls and cast a vote for Davis that did not mean a single vote in the electoral college. He carried a limited number of States in which he received less than 2,000,000 votes, and for those 2,000,000 votes he received 136 electoral votes. In other words, 3,000,000 votes meant no electoral votes; 2,000,000 votes meant 136 electoral votes.

"It is apparent there is no mathematical accuracy in the plan on a basis of inherent justice. In a close contest the result is subjected to chance, a turn of fortune. A large percent of the uncertainty is whether or not the plurality candidate will receive a larger percentage of the disfranchised votes than his opponent.

"In the election of 1928 the proportion of voters who were disfranchised in this way—that is, voters whose ballots were not only not counted as voted, but contrary to the way they voted—amounted to 38 percent of all the votes of the people of the United States. In other words, 38 people out of every hundred who voted had their votes thrown into the waste basket at the State line and they were not considered when the votes were counted at the joint session of Congress, where the result was finally determined.

"In the election of 1932 the votes of 39 out of every 100 people who voted were likewise discarded and not considered when the vote was computed here in the Capitol.

"In 1932 Hoover received 2,150,000 votes in States he carried, and which gave him 59 electoral votes. In the single State of New York Hoover received 1,938,000 votes, and not a single electoral vote. His votes in that one State almost equaled all of his votes in the States he carried, and yet from those States he received 59 votes and from New York nothing.

"Hoover's vote in New York, at the recent election, equaled his total vote in 23 other States in the Union. Hoover received nearly 15,800,000 votes and over 13,600,000 of those votes brought him no electoral vote whatever. All of his electoral votes came from the 2,000,000 and none from the 13,000,000.

"The total majority Hoover received in all States he carried was 230,585. If a majority of those votes in each State, 116,000 in all, could have been transferred to Roosevelt, the election would have been unanimous. Hoover would not have received a single electoral vote. Having received over 39 percent of all the votes, nevertheless, the election would have been unanimous. Hoover's name would not have been mentioned in the poll we heard over in the Capitol. As the votes were counted President Hoover's name was not mentioned in connection with the electoral votes represented by over 13,600,000 persons who voted for him.

"Mr. Hoover received only the electoral votes brought to him by the votes of 5.3 percent of the voters of the Nation who voted in the States he carried. He received no electoral votes from 34.2 percent of the voters of the Nation who voted for him in the States he did not carry. In other words, 34.2 percent of the votes of the Nation gave him no electoral votes and 5.3 percent gave him 59 electoral votes."

In the election of 1936, 35 people out of every 100 who voted had their votes disregarded when the electors gathered in Washington.

In the election of 1944, the votes of 45 out of every 100 people who voted were, in effect, disfranchised. A system of computing election results that discards 45 percent of the voters before the final count begins cannot be said to be either just or accurate.

In 1944, in the State of Ohio, Roosevelt received 1,570,763 votes, which was a bare 11,500 votes less than Dewey received there. Yet he received not a single electoral vote, while Dewey gathered the State's 25 electoral votes.

In the 1940 election in the State of New York, Willkie received only 224,440 less votes than did Mr. Roosevelt out of 6,279,396 votes cast for both these candidates. Nevertheless, Roosevelt received the entire New York electoral vote of 47, while Willkie received not a single electoral vote. As a matter of fact, Willkie's 3,027,478 votes almost equaled the 4,266,676 votes which he received in the States he carried; and yet from those States he received 82 electoral votes and from New York nothing.

WINS MOST VOTES AND LOSES

A second defect in the present system is that it makes possible a situation in which the candidate with the most popular votes receives the least electoral votes. This has actually happened three times in our history.

In 1824 Andrew Jackson secured a popular plurality of 50,000 votes over John Quincy Adams, but failed of the Presidency when the election was decided by the House of Representatives.

In 1876 Hayes became President by the majority of 1 electoral vote even though Tilden actually received 258,000 more votes than he did.

In 1888 Cleveland lost the Presidency even though he had a popular vote of 5,540,050 against Harrison's 5,444,337.

It is certainly quite probable that in future elections one candidate will receive the electoral vote and another the popular vote, and this is a contingency against which we should guard. The passions and hatreds that a bitter elective struggle engenders could well lead to violent and bloody conditions under such circumstances. This almost proved to be the case in 1876. Had Samuel J. Tilden taken a belligerent attitude, the United States might well have been plunged into civil strife. Fortunately, he refused to listen to the pleas of his followers to seize the Presidency by force. In the lands of our Latin-American neighbors violence flares because of far less provocative election disputes.

The following table shows the difference between popular and electoral vote:

Comparison of percentage of popular to electoral votes

[Fractions ignored]

Year	Candidate	Popular vote	Electoral vote	Discrepancy

DISCRIMINATION

A third defect is the discrimination between different classes of voters. The votes of those living in small States count for more than the votes of those residing in big States. South Carolina, for example, in 1944 had one electoral vote for each 11,893 popular votes cast in that State, while New York had one electoral vote for each 133,869 popular votes. Each South Carolina voter, therefore, was equal to 11 New Yorkers in electing a President.

The following table shows how much more a vote in a small State counts than a vote of an equally worthy citizen in a large State.

The number of votes necessary in each State to equal one South Carolina vote, 1944

DEADLOCKS

A fourth defect is the method provided for breaking deadlocks. The Constitution provides that in such a case the election of the President shall be cast into the House of Representatives where he shall be elected by a majority vote of the Members—not voting as individual Members, however, but voting by States. It is, therefore, possible for 25 small States, with a total membership of only 89 out of a total of 435 Members, to control the election.

USELESS

A fifth defect is the uselessness of the electors. They are not people who use their independent judgment. They are not nearly as well known to the voters as are the candidates for President and Vice President. The people need no go-between of this kind. It is, moreover, possible for a dangerous situation to arise in a close election where one or two electoral votes may have a decisive effect. The danger does not lie in the theoretical possibility that the delegate might forget his pledge. It does lie in the possibility that he might be sick, or insane, or suddenly killed—or might meet with any of the uncontrollable mischances to which human flesh is heir. These risks are unavoidable for individual human beings; it is not necessary, however, to inject them into our system for electing a President.

ENCOURAGES FRAUD

A sixth defect, although an incidental one, in the present system is that it encourages fraud. By concentrating effort in a few doubtful States, the chance for corrupt electoral practices increases. The close New York State margin of 1,247 for Cleveland, to which reference has been made, for example, stood between him and 35 electoral votes. Thirty-five votes can mean the difference between victory or defeat. What a temptation for the boss and the machines. What a strategic place for them to stand.

ABUSE OF POWER

A seventh defect which is of minor importance is the theoretical possibility that the electors would abuse their power and disregard the Constitution. Those who set up dictatorships are often careful to preserve constitutional forms. This form serves no good purpose.

DISFRANCHISES NEGRO

The eighth defect is the tendency of the present system to disfranchise the Negro. Under a system in which no minority votes are counted, there is scant incentive to bring out the Negro vote. Under a system where all minority votes are counted there is reason to call forth a wider public participation in government, because even though a voter is in the minority in his own State, he may not be in a minority nationally.

These, then, are eight defects in our present system. They have been well summed up in the House report previously referred to, in the following paragraph:

"The only legitimate object of an election is to accomplish the will of the people. If we permit a system to prevail that thwarts that will, we trifle with one of the most serious purposes of the Government. Under our present method, now and then, that will of the people will be clearly thwarted. When that may happen, in the face of an intense inflamed public sentiment, we needlessly test the serenity and security of our Government. We plant hate, discord, and distrust where we could have Nation-wide concurrence in the good-will acceptance of the just verdict of the American people."

REFORM OF SYSTEM

Many attempts have been made to reform the system. Andrew Jackson was impressed with its defects. Agitation to change it rose strongly after the disputed election of 1876. In recent years Representative LEA, in collaboration with Senator Norris, has carried on an admirable campaign of public education and has produced a plan of his own which proposes to divide the State vote among the candidates in exact proportion to their popular vote. As he put it: "Abolish the electoral college; retain electoral votes; let the people vote directly; abolish the unit State vote and give each candidate the electoral votes of the State in exact proportion to his popular vote."

This plan is assuredly a big step forward. It eliminates the evil of unit voting and makes a deadlock unlikely, if not impossible. The only plan, however, which remedies all defects is that of electing the President by direct vote of the people.

That this is a far-reaching step which should not be undertaken without grave deliberation cannot be denied. But that it is a step which should be presented to the people for study, discussion, and perfection is equally true.

It has been too often and too lightly dismissed. Some of the things said against it are not well founded. It is said, for instance, that the voters are qualified by State laws and that the decision on the question of who should vote is a decision for the States. It is even asserted that for the Federal Government to interest itself in the question of voting qualifications is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. Those who are impressed with this argument should read the Constitution, noting especially the way in which that document concerns itself with qualifications for voting, particularly in amendment XV.

It is said that the popular election of the President would give certain sections and certain parties undue influence. It is, of course, not our mission to help or hurt this party or that. It should be our task to render justice. I submit, however, that none can predict with any reasonable degree of accuracy that any party would suffer. The knowledge, for example, that all votes would be counted in the total would encourage voting by members of minority parties in States where they now do not bother to make a civic effort. They would know that their votes would matter. This would change the proportion of persons in those States going to the polls. But it would in the end damage neither party. Political parties have many other and closer opportunities for damaging themselves.

It is said that the popular election of the President would encourage fraud in the big cities. It may well be asked whether fraudulent electoral practices do not exist in many big cities today. It may be further set down that the present system, by unduly stressing the importance of certain States, gives a greater encouragement to the city machine.

Finally, the objection is made that election of a President by popular vote is an infringement of the rights of the States. That it does eliminate certain States' rights—many of which, let it be said, are largely matters of form—cannot be denied. We confront, however, the proposition that the only two elected officials to whom we can look to speak exclusively for the United States as a whole are the President and the Vice President. That the American people as a whole should have a prime concern and a decisive voice in how they are chosen seems both elementary and just.

MARGARET M. COLGAN

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit for appropriate reference a resolution to pay the usual sum to the widow of Eugene C. Colgan, late an employee of the Republican Policy Committee of the Senate.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 96) was received, and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Margaret M. Colgan, widow of Eugene C. Colgan, late an employee of the Senate, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

FARM-LABOR SUPPLY PROGRAM—AMENDMENT

Mr. CAPPER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2102) to provide for a 6 months' extension and final liquidation of the farm-labor supply program, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

SUSPENSION OF CERTAIN IMPORT TAXES ON COPPER—AMENDMENT

Mr. McFARLAND (for himself, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. HATCH, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, Mr. WATKINS, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. ECTON, Mr. MCCARRAN, Mr. MALONE, and Mr. AIKEN) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (H. R. 2404) to suspend certain import taxes on copper, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred, as indicated:

H. R. 173. An act to authorize the sale of certain public land in Alaska to Victory Bible Camp Ground, Inc.; and

H. R. 1288. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant a private right-of-way to Roscoe L. Wood; to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. R. 326. An act for the relief of Wilma E. Baker;

H. R. 348. An act for the relief of Dr. Alma Richards and Mrs. Mary Block;

H. R. 360. An act for the relief of the legal guardian of Francis Eugene Hardin, a minor;

H. R. 384. An act for the relief of W. H. Baker and Walter Baker;

H. R. 428. An act for the relief of Charles N. Bemis;

H. R. 444. An act for the relief of the estate of Archie S. Woods, deceased;

H. R. 555. An act for the relief of Edna Rita Saffron Fidone;

H. R. 620. An act for the relief of Blanche E. Broad;

H. R. 621. An act for the relief of Vera Frances Elicker;

H. R. 811. An act for the relief of J. F. Powers;

H. R. 1494. An act for the relief of the estate of Nellie P. Dunn, deceased; and

H. R. 2094. An act for the relief of Isaac B. Jones; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H. R. 2535. An act to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

THE MEANING OF THE MORMON MIGRATION IN AMERICAN HISTORY—STATEMENT BY SENATOR THOMAS OF UTAH

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have made part of my remarks a statement I have prepared on the subject The Meaning of the Mormon Migration in American History.

This is the Utah centennial year, and all friends of Utah are interested in any thoughtful presentation in connection with the original settlement in our State. Therefore, I deem it not out of place to make this request.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1847—UTAH CENTENNIAL—1947

THE MEANING OF THE MORMON MIGRATION IN AMERICAN HISTORY

In 1847 Utah was Mexican territory. For years the contest for the control of what is now the western part of the United States had been going on. The Spanish-Mexican control reached as far north as what is now the southern boundary of Oregon. The Russians were in Alaska and had settlements down the coast as far as the Russian River in California. French fur traders had penetrated most of the West and traders from all nations were wandering over it. The British claimed the Pacific coast as far down as northern California. The United States, thought of today as an expanding world power, seemed then to be checked as a controller of the Pacific coastline.

We of today, sensing our debt to our pioneer fathers, never cease honoring them for their courage, their faith, their zeal, and their persistence in carrying the American flag into foreign territory. Because these characteristics of courage and faith are so worthy of honor and so satisfying to us, we sometimes fail to recognize the real significance, in an international sense, of what they did.

America in 1845–47, and for many years after and before, was on the alert, on the move, and restless about her boundaries. There was the Texas independence and then the Mexican War. Both were repercussions of restlessly expanding cultural and political groups with economic hopes.

Four outstanding movements, however, were movements above that of mere adventure, conquest, or pursuit of wealth. One, although connected with war and therefore a part of conquest, was the march of Kearny's army with its Mormon battalion. This march cut the Mexican controlled empire in two. When it is remembered that this battalion was recruited from Mormons already on the march, Mormon incentive and influence should be credited as a contributing force. Two were wholly inspired by Mormon thought; the pioneer journey, under the leadership of Brigham Young, into the Salt Lake Valley, and the trip of Sam Brannon and his associates around the Horn to San Francisco. The fourth decisive journey was the movement of the devout settlers carrying the Bible and the plow into the Oregon Territory.

The Oregon journeys were for home-making and home-building. The Mormon expeditions were for the same purposes, but motivated by revelation and in fulfillment of prophecy. These purposes were high, lofty, and splendid. The two Mormon inspired movements had above their vision, their purposefulness, their relying on the plow and the Bible, and their home-building culture something more significant from the standpoint of nation-building. It was their international effect. Millions have made homes in foreign lands without affecting the international politics of those lands. But the two Mormon journeys and the journey of the Oregon pioneers had meaning bigger than is generally recognized. They meant a transferring of political sovereignty, a transporting of a culture and a civilization, and making certain a land dedicated to the free. The pilgrim fathers wanted a home where they could worship God as they saw fit. They expected it under the sanction of a king whose homeland did not let persons worship as they saw fit. This settlement with others in America were settlements that made the independent land of the United States a land of liberty and a land of freedom inevitable, but it did not come for nearly two centuries.

The Mormon journeys and the journey into the Oregon Territory brought almost instantaneous success. I do not say that these journeys are the causes of the ultimate change and the overcoming of international struggle for the western part of the United States. But viewed merely as incidents in the restlessness and national striving which was the spirit of America at that time they stand out so strongly that if they had acted entirely alone the results would have been the same. The dividing of the Spanish-Mexican Empire, the permanent settlement in San Francisco, the permanent settlement in the Salt Lake Valley, the permanent settlement in the Oregon country would have brought by themselves the same result in time, while mere adventure, mere conquest, mere seeking of wealth would not have done it. These four movements did make certain that the intermountain and Pacific coast country would be American.

The great expansion of which this was a part did not stop with the coast. Perry with his ships was in Japan by 1853. Calib Cushing had negotiated his treaty in China even before this in 1844. And a continuing movement of the Mormon part of this restlessness was reflected in the Gibson "conquest" in Hawaii in 1861. Mormon missionaries had circled the globe before the death of their Prophet-founder in 1844 and before the migration to the Rocky Mountains began.

The Mormon pioneer movement, whether viewed as a part of the spread of the white man over the globe, or whether viewed as a movement inspired by western United States restlessness, has left its mark on its people and in the development of American culture and traditions. It is for this reason that the thoughtful people throughout the whole earth recognize the Mormon contribution in the development of America. Every true follower of the Mormon ideal, whether he be American or foreign-born, knows the part America is to play in the ultimate destiny of the world.

PRIVATE BUSINESS OPERATIONS IN OAK RIDGE AREA

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have received a telegram from Mr. William Badgett, of Knoxville, Tenn., concerning certain conditions at Oak Ridge, Tenn. I am unable to give information on the subject of the telegram, but I desire to put it in the RECORD, if I may have unanimous consent to do so.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KNOXVILLE, TENN., March 17, 1947.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Am representing people who hold private contracts to engage in business on the Government area, Oak Ridge, Tenn. My client has received notice that contract will be terminated and functions taken over by a so-called Oak Ridge Recreation and Welfare Association. Private business is due to terminate March 20 and Col. Bill Britton, who is in charge under title of N. H. E. F. Director of Public Welfare, Atomic Energy Commission, refuses to continue contracts to persons now engaged in private enterprises on Oak Ridge area. Persons holding private contracts on Oak Ridge area have large sums invested under assurance of continued operation. There is no reason why private enterprise should be denied the privilege of continuing operations in Oak Ridge area. Oak Ridge is not a Federal reservation and Government operation of business ordinarily performed by private enterprise is not authorized by Atomic Energy Act.

Oak Ridge Recreation and Welfare Association is either a front for Government operations or for some other interests. No one knows what happens to funds of Oak Ridge Recreation and Welfare Association and there is no authorization for operations of businesses ordinarily performed by private enterprise in Oak Ridge area. In Atomic Energy Act, I believe a thorough investigation is necessary and will be most revealing. Request you seek to hold matters in status quo with respect to private enterprises until a thorough investigation can be made.

With kindest personal regards,

BILL BADGETT.

APPOINTMENTS TO ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to read a letter received by me today from Howard B. Rand, editor of Destiny, the magazine of national life, published at Haverhill, Mass. The letter, which is addressed to me, reads as follows:

DESTINY,

Haverhill, Mass., March 17, 1947.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,

Senate Office Building,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCKELLAR: I am taking the liberty of sending you the last issue of Destiny magazine, and your attention is respectfully called to an article on page 119 setting forth the qualifications necessary for those who are to be elected or appointed to office.

Your attention is also called to the statement in the Los Angeles Examiner of January 9, 1947, in which it was stated: "David E. Lilienthal, head of the Board, is a long-time ardent New Dealer and a member of at least two Communist-dominated organizations, the National Lawyers Guild and the Southern Conference of Human Welfare. The FBI and the House Committee on Un-American Activities hold these groups to be potentially subversive, alined with the world movement to overthrow this Government. Associated with Lilienthal on the Atomic Energy Board is Lewis E. Strauss, also a New Dealer and a member of Kuhn, Loeb & Co." If my memory serves me right, Kuhn, Loeb & Co. is the banking institution that furnished the major portion of the money used by those who overthrew the Czarist Government in 1918 and set up bolshevism in that land.

A third member of the Atomic Energy Board, William W. Waymack, was reported in the Los Angeles Examiner of the same date as apparently being strongly pro-Communist and sympathetic to Soviet Russia.

If there is the slightest doubt whatever as to the communistic tendency of any man he should not be appointed on this most important Board. After all, Soviet Russia is working for world revolution, and the United States of America is on the agenda, with groundwork being laid in our country for the day when this Government can be taken over by these evil forces. It is imperative that the secret of the atomic bomb, the number of bombs, and particularly the place of their storage be kept in the hands of thoroughly loyal Americans, else we may awaken and find to our sorrow that our own stock pile of bombs has passed into the hands of the enemies of our former Government and will be used against us.

I believe this matter of entrusting the secret of atomic power to a Board is the most vital issue before the Senate today. Men with the qualifications set forth in the enclosed article should be the only type appointed to such a Board.

Yours sincerely,

HOWARD B. RAND,

Editor.

I also ask, Mr. President, that the article which appears on page 119 of Destiny be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ESSENTIAL QUALIFICATIONS

The next 2 years will be the most critical period in the history of the United States, for on the agenda are events which will shake this Nation to its very foundation. Because this period is to be fraught with momentous happenings, the qualifications required of the men who will hold positions of authority over us should be of the highest possible standard.

Our Nation was founded upon the Bible and the principles of the Christian faith have tempered our acts and methods in the affairs of national administration. Upon such a foundation this Nation grew from small beginnings until today it has become a major world power and at the moment is in exclusive control of the most fearful type of destruction known to man—the atom bomb. Having reached national maturity, evil forces are increasing their pressure to control and administer the affairs of this great people and, if successful, would completely divorce that administration from Christian principles. Already we have departed from our original precepts, since the ideals and aspirations of a government reflect the principles of those who are in positions of authority. Men in office should at least conform in spirit and thought with that required of leaders under Moses:

"Moreover thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness and place such over them" Exodus 18: 21.

To this instruction should be added the high standard of New Testament requirements exemplified in the instructions given by Jesus Christ in the Beatitudes. He gave the qualifications of those who will have authority in His Kingdom. They will be self-effacing, kind-hearted, desiring only that righteousness shall be established, merciful, and in whose hearts there will be no evil. Is the President appointing for office and is Congress confirming the appointment of men who have such qualifications? Observation leads to the conclusion that political expediency seems to far outweigh any other consideration in these selections.

This is an hour of crisis, and, regardless of race or color, only men who possess the above attributes should be selected. Because of past failures in this respect, our Nation today is afflicted with maladministration and corruption. A committee is now to be entrusted with the most destructive force at our command, and every member of that committee should be made to pass the above qualification test. God help us if we require less, for the very safety of our Nation, and even its future existence, rests in the hands of this committee.

Russia is using every means at her command to secure the secret of the atomic bomb. Because a Communist cannot be trusted, and due to the fact that the question of his sympathy with Communists ideologies has been raised in connection with Mr. David Eli Lilienthal, every doubt should be removed as to his allegiances before confirming his appointment. With this in mind, and the need of recognizing the qualifications as set forth by both Moses and Jesus Christ for holding office, the following telegram was sent to a Member of the Senate who occupies an influential position:

"May I respectfully direct your attention to the following salient facts which have a pertinent bearing on the confirmation of Lilienthal to head the Atomic Energy Commission. The safety of our Nation absolutely depends upon the beliefs of the man holding this important position. History amply verifies that the only men who can be absolutely trusted are those of sterling Christian character. There is universal agreement that use of atomic energy has introduced into our generation the possibility of fearful destruction or untold blessings. The ultimate decision as to which it shall be lies in the hands of men who will have control of atomic power. Since this is an American decision of crisis, in the interest of the preservation of the American Nation, should we not remember what Gen. George Washington meant in a critical stage in the American Revolution when he said, 'Let only Americans be on guard tonight.'

"HOWARD B. RAND,
"Editor of Destiny Magazine."

If Mr. Lilienthal is a man of sterling Christian character, untainted by the doctrines of communism, the Senate confirmation will be in order. If he does not so qualify, then by his appointment we are but moving that much more rapidly along the road to increasing troubles and incalculable disaster.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I call the particular attention of my colleagues and of the entire country to this letter and to this fine magazine article on the subject of communism and the confirmation of Lilienthal's nomination. Our administration is firmly opposed to communism in Greece and in Turkey, and that is fine; but this letter and article strikingly show how important it is also not to appoint to high public office, especially to the Atomic Energy Commission, as director or member, men who are in sympathy with Communist doctrines and who have shown their interest in communism.

ESTABLISHMENT OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT LABOR RELATIONS COURTS

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, committees in both House of Congress are now working on proposed labor laws. The measures now being considered are amendments to existing laws, because such laws failed to accomplish the results desired by our citizens, or are new laws to prohibit evils existing in our labor industrial relations.

These laws, when enacted, will not be self-executing; machinery will be required to enforce and carry them out. In the past we have not paid sufficient attention to such machinery. We must not forget that law without enforcement is a mockery.

We know how close to disaster our entire economic and political system came during the past few years because labor and management failed voluntarily to settle their disputes, and we in Congress failed to provide adequate machinery to adjudicate the disputes so as to protect the public interest.

During the steel strike, during the rail strike, and during two different coal strikes, 140,000,000 Americans stood by helplessly as our magnificent industrial system began grinding to a stop.

The last coal strike marks the eighth time in 5 years that a private citizen has threatened to deprive his Nation of its major source of industrial power. During each of those eight times at least 25,000,000 American workers, aside from miners, have faced the prospect of unemployment.

Even more discouraging, we have seen, during these seemingly innumerable industrial crises, the spectacle of the President of our Nation trying to intervene to bring peace, only to be defied or abused for his efforts. So far as industrial disputes are concerned we are in a state of near anarchy. Our Government, in this area, has lost its power to govern.

This situation has become intolerable. We cannot afford a national paralysis every few months, simply because labor and industrial managers cannot agree on a contract, or on the interpretation of one made by them.

When labor disputes which affect the public interest occur and are not settled, our citizens have reason to ask what has become of our system of government under law.

Why are labor-management disputes any different from landlord-tenant disputes except that the issues are bigger, more people are involved, and the economic security of the Nation is endangered?

Basically they are the same. The difference is in the handling of the issues. Industrial disputes are still settled on the basis of economic power. Which side can outstrangle the other in a showdown? And nowadays these strangle holds cover such wide areas that the public's neck is usually included.

The time has come to settle these disputes on the basis of justice instead of on the basis of strangle holds.

I think we should subject industrial disputes, along with all other disputes, to the legal discipline of a civilized society.

Labor-industrial disputes should come within the jurisdiction of a court established to handle them. The machinery to provide the legal discipline of a civilized society must be designed as nearly as humanly possible to carry out two basic principles; first, that we are a government of law and not of men; and second, that there must be equal justice under law.

Throughout our history, in all other fields of endeavor we have discovered that the machinery best suited to settle disputes and arrive at just decisions is the courts. Yet in labor-industrial relations, we still cling to the principle that economic and political pressure should govern. We create boards, commissions, or bureaus, and place on them special pleaders, or instructed partisan jurors, who act as prosecutors, judges, and juries, and the people wonder why the system does not work. This method would not be successful in any other field of endeavor and it will not work in labor-management relations.

To me, the appealing thing about a court system is that it is simple, clear-cut, understandable, fair, and the least political of our institutions. It is neither antilabor nor antimanagement, but rather is proeverybody. Our courts have long been admired as symbols of impartial justice, and I believe that the labor-relations courts would soon likewise become such symbols.

In a republic, citizens must be permitted to work out their problems between themselves. This is fundamental and essential if we are to retain individual liberty. That is why collective bargaining will work if given a chance. That is why we should provide for mediation and voluntary arbitration of disputes to arrive at a collective-bargaining agreement and in the interpretation of such an agreement. But the same principle demands that, when all these voluntary steps fail, and the dispute affects the public interest, each party to the dispute, and the public, shall have the right to say that the dispute must be judicially adjudicated in order to protect the public interest.

The great principle which has shaped America's growth for a century and a half is that of equal justice under law. I believe that if we are to fulfill our destiny as a people it is time to broaden the application of that principle to include labor-management relations.

Let justice, and not power politics, reign in our workshops.

Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill in behalf of myself and the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], to establish United States district labor-relations courts, to define their jurisdiction, and for other purposes.

I may say that the bill provides for labor-relations courts, with jurisdiction over the interpretation of collective-bargaining contracts and labor statutes. At the present time it will cover a great majority of labor industrial disputes.

Jurisdiction to compel collective-bargaining contracts in basic industries is not included, as more time and study are required to develop such legislation.

I request that the bill be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. IVES in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have joined with the distinguished Senator from Michigan in introducing the Federal Labor Relations Court Act.

As a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I am working with my colleagues on that committee on measures to correct current abuses in the labor situation, to improve the conciliation and mediation machinery, and to insure individual workers protection against exploitation both by unfair employers and by power-obsessed labor unions.

But beyond these corrective measures which are called for at the moment I have all along had the feeling that we have been remiss in getting at the very heart of this matter. We have permitted remedies for labor disputes to drift along while those labor disputes threaten the very peace of our society. We have permitted labor-management disputes to come to a dead end and to be settled by the rule of force. We have tried to equalize the weight of the "brass knuckles" in the contest and have then told the parties to "slug it out." We have not made a statesmanlike effort to find out what is right and just, but we have rather left the matter to the determination between the parties of who is strongest in a knock-down, drag-out struggle.

We have not adequately set our minds to the problem of creating tribunals that will have the confidence of the contending parties and to which they can go to seek justice.

I am well aware of the difficulty of setting up any kind of labor courts that can determine on what terms one man may work for another, but there does remain a large area of differences between management on the one hand, and labor on the other hand, which can well be determined by our normal judicial processes. The purpose of the Ferguson-Smith bill is to set up tribunals which will promptly and effectively, and on a high judicial plane, dispose of those issues in labor disputes which we can designate as justiciable.

In this opening experiment with the labor relations court program, we have limited the jurisdiction of the courts to: one, the interpretation and enforcement of collective bargaining agreements; and two, the interpretation of existing labor legislation. There is something inherently wrong in leaving the interpretation of what a law means to an administrative agency which is charged with the duty of enforcing that law. There is likewise something inherently wrong in leaving the interpretation of what two parties meant by the language of a contract to a similar administrative agency. We are clearly sound in taking the position that there is an area for the application of normal judicial processes to management-labor relations.

The objection has been made that if these matters go to the ordinary courts the decision of the issues will be so long delayed that the parties will suffer unduly before knowing what their rights and obligations are. This is another reason for setting up the special courts which the bill provides for so that immediate action can be taken and the right-of-way given to labor disputes which it has been impossible for the parties to settle either by collective bargaining or by conciliation or mediation machinery provided for in our labor laws.

At this time we are not proposing to give the courts any jurisdiction over the bargaining process itself. We believe that the limited jurisdiction we have given the courts will take care of at least three-quarters of all the disputes between management and labor, and we hope that by experimenting with this court procedure program we may find ourselves on the road towards the ultimate settlement of all management-labor disputes on the basis of what is right and just, and not on the basis of who is strongest in a show of force.

My colleague and I are now studying the whole question of national paralysis cases, in which the interest of the public must be paramount. The Supreme Court of the United States in the recent Lewis case indicated that in such cases, if the Government took the properties over, a stoppage of work could be prevented. We do not believe in the Government taking over, but we do believe that we may be able to find a special procedure for those cases in which the health and safety of the people are affected and in which it will be necessary for the Government, preferably through the courts, to act in order to maintain the status quo and continued production pending an equitable adjustment of the disputes.

Mr. President, I am convinced that this bill is an important contribution to the correct approach to the ultimate solution of labor-management difficulties. I am in no way minimizing my insistence on the principle that voluntary collective bargaining between the parties must always be the first bulwark of labor peace, and that mediation and conciliation must be completely explored before we even approach the normal legal processes.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan for permitting me to say this word in support of the bill which we have introduced together.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I had not intended to interrupt the Senator, but inasmuch as he has been interrupted, I rise to say that, of course, he knows of my great sympathy with what he is endeavoring to do. From the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey, I am not quite clear as to how far the bill which has just been introduced goes in cases in which the national safety is involved, where perhaps a contract has expired, and negotiations for a new contract are in progress, and the parties cannot agree and a strike ensues, perhaps imperiling the welfare of the entire Nation. Does the bill take care of a situation of that kind?

Mr. FERGUSON. Not at the present time. We are working to include that subject in the jurisdiction of the proposed court. That is one of the real problems, as to whether the court should take over the plant and operate it as a plant would be operated under receivership, a procedure with which lawyers are familiar, or whether, as under the Smith-Connally Act, the Executive should take it over. Naturally there is that great problem as to the jurisdiction of the court. The question is whether or not we can agree that this is solely a judicial question. That is why we feel that the establishment of the court is so important. The great majority of disputes arise over the interpretation of contracts, and the great majority of strikes result from such disputes. Yet we all recognize the existence of cases which paralyze the Nation, and we are working toward the point where jurisdiction can be placed in a system which is the least political of any we have in the Republic, and that is the judicial system.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield, let me say that I am in entire sympathy with what he is trying to do. I am only sorry that the bill which he is introducing does not include some feature along that line.

Entirely aside from the merits of the bill itself, another question comes to my mind. From a parliamentary standpoint, to what committee should such a bill be referred?

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Michigan was hoping that it would be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not know to what committee it will be referred. I merely ask that it be appropriately referred.

Mr. HATCH. Of course, it does involve essential problems of labor legislation.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is true.

Mr. HATCH. I was concerned as to which committee was the appropriate committee.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. In reply to the last question asked by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, the Senator from Michigan will bear me out in the statement that we discussed the question of the appropriate committee to which the bill should be referred. While I am a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, my own judgment is that a question of this kind properly belongs in the Committee on the Judiciary, because it has to do with the court system. Personally I am making no claim for the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. However, it is up to the Presiding Officer to determine the appropriate committee for reference.

Mr. HATCH. I am sure that the Presiding Officer will make the appropriate reference. However, it occurs to me that the bill might properly go to either committee.

Mr. FERGUSON. I appreciate the remarks of the able Senator from New Mexico in connection with the bill. He can rest assured that the able Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Michigan will be happy to confer with him on the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Of course, I shall be very happy to confer with the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from New Jersey. However, as the Senator knows, I have been quite puzzled and perplexed as to the best approach. I was hopeful that the two Senators had found the final answer.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Further in answer to the question raised by the Senator from New Mexico, I should like to advise him that personally I think there is a place in this bill for what might be called part 2, dealing exclusively with national paralysis cases, and I think the Senator from Michigan and I will be glad to consider that question further. We thought that it was timely to introduce the bill now. If it meets with the approval of the appropriate committee, and we feel that in the meantime something can properly be added covering the national paralysis cases, it is my hope that the bill will be reported with such additions incorporated in it.

Mr. FERGUSON. I thank the Senator from New Jersey for his remarks. I think they will make the record clear as to what we are endeavoring to do.

The bill (S. 937) to establish United States district labor relations courts, to define their jurisdiction, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. FERGUSON for himself and Mr. SMITH, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AID TO GREECE AND TURKEY

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, by request, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for assistance to Greece and to Turkey, which is identical with House bill 2616. I want to make it plain that I am not familiar with the details of the proposal, and have had no opportunity to pass upon the details. I am simply introducing the bill for the Senate's convenience so the Senate may have a Senate print of the House bill upon which to work.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 938) to provide for assistance to Greece and Turkey, introduced by Mr. VANDENBERG (by request), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. FERGUSON. The constitutionality of the bill which is now before the Senate has been challenged by some, and I want to speak upon that question at this time.

The preamble clearly sets forth the economic and, yes, even the political reason for the bill itself. I think it is clear that economically something must be done, and the question then involved is this: Is the remedy now provided by this bill one which is constitutional? Can we constitutionally take away causes of action, or, as we lawyers call them, vested rights, or unvested rights, whichever the case may be?

We hear much upon the street to the effect that the bill is unconstitutional. We hear it said, and it is true, that the Constitution itself provides in the fifth amendment that no property can be taken from any citizen without due process of law. Therefore we have to answer this question: Does the proposed legislation violate the fifth amendment of the Constitution and, therefore, is it void? I think the answer is "No."

The provisions of the fifth amendment may not be invoked to obstruct a national policy which Congress has power to adopt.

It is clear that if Congress can invalidate a contract made with reference to existing law it can invalidate a cause of action which exists because of statute.

Congress has complete authority to regulate by legislation in the field of interstate commerce and has done so by the Fair Labor Standards Act. The Constitution authorizes Congress to act in this field, and Congress did act and passed certain legislation. Congress now proposes to take away those rights. No one can contract against that right of Congress. It is what Chief Justice Hughes called the congenital infirmities in the Norman against B. & O. case.

It seems clear one cannot secure a vested right under a regulatory statute passed by Congress if such statute is in the exercise of one of its granted powers.

Would the provision in the Constitution forbidding ex post facto laws make this proposed portal-to-portal law unconstitutional? I have heard it said by laymen that the Congress cannot pass an ex post facto law. That is true. But we must decide whether or not this would be an ex post facto law. My answer to that question is "No," because it is clear that this provision in the Constitution applies only to criminal statutes. This is not the enactment of an ex post facto criminal law.

Does the fact that the act is retroactive in its application make it unconstitutional? The answer is "No."

It may be said that legislation cannot be held invalid, even though vested rights are thereby destroyed, merely on the ground that it is retroactive.

Such laws may be held invalid only because they offend some specific constitutional provision.

Is the act unconstitutional because it is declaratory in its nature? I believe the answer is "No."

The proposed legislation is not declaratory. It is not an attempt to say what the Congress intended when they passed the Fair Labor Standards Act.

We are not attempting here to say to the Supreme Court or to the people of the United States, "You have misinterpreted what Congress said in the Fair Labor Standards Act." If we did that we would be attempting to pass a declaratory law. This is not declaratory, and therefore it cannot be said that it would be unconstitutional for that reason.

Another question is this: Is this legislation unconstitutional because it would impair the obligation of a contract? I am of the opinion that it is not. The only constitutional prohibition against the impairing of contractual obligations is directed against the States and not the Congress. However, it is true that a denial of due process may, in effect, be an impairment of the obligation of a contract. I have spoken heretofore on this question and demonstrated, I think, that under the facts and circumstances this proposal does not constitute a denial of due process. This is legislation taking away a newly acquired right, which was born with the courts' interpretation of the statute and which is on a very different basis from rights of long standing and definitely and specifically covered by contract.

The right to be abolished by this legislation rests upon the statute and, therefore, falls within subsequent repeal or inconsistent legislation.

Congress in the exercise of one of its powers to legislate for the general welfare may destroy vested rights.

Mr. President, because I could not vote for a measure which I believe to be unconstitutional and because the questions involved in this proposed legislation seemed to me to be so important, I devoted considerable time to it before arriving at the conclusion which I have reached. During the course of my consideration I have had the benefit of an opinion written by Henry M. Bates, who was the dean of the University of Michigan Law School. At this place in the RECORD I should like to insert the biographical information with reference to Dean Bates which is found in Who's Who in America. It is as follows:

Bates, Henry Moore, emeritus professor of law and dean; born, Chicago, Ill., March 30, 1869; son of George Chapman and Alice E. B.; Ph. B., University of Michigan, 1890, LL. D., 1941; LL. B., Northwestern, 1892; LL. D., Kalamazoo College, 1925, Wayne University, 1940; married Clara A. Belfield, September 4, 1894; one daughter, Helen Belfield Van Tyne. Practiced law Chicago, 1892–1903, member of firm Harlan & Bates; Tappan professor of law, University of Michigan, 1903–39, dean, law school, 1910–39; emeritus since 1939; professor of law, Harvard Law School, 1917–18. President, Association American Law Schools, 1912–13; member executive committee, American Institute of Criminal Law, 1911–14; president, Order of the Coif (legal scholarship society), 1913–16; commissioner on uniform State laws, 1921–33; member, American Bar Association, American Political Science Association, Chicago Law Institute, American Judicature Society (member, board of directors), Social Science Research Council, Phi Beta Kappa, Alpha Delta Phi, Phi Delta Phi; charter member, American Law Institute (member of council, 1924–29); fellow American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Clubs: University, Chicago Literary (Chicago), Detroit, Economic (Detroit). Home: 1921 Cambridge Road. Office: Legal Research Building, Ann Arbor, Mich.

Dean Bates taught constitutional law at Michigan for 29 years and is a nationally recognized authority on the subject.

Since the Senator from Michigan studied constitutional law under Dean Bates, some persons may think that the dean's interpretation of the Constitution is somewhat outmoded, but I am sure that he has kept up with the decisions of the Supreme Court, as I also have tried to do, and I for one am willing to take the Constitution as it is today and discuss the question whether or not this proposed law is constitutional on the basis of the Constitution as it has been interpreted up to the year 1947.

I believe that this opinion or memorandum is of such importance that I should read it, so that if any of the Members of the Senate desire to debate the questions involved, they may be in a position to do so. I understand it is the intention of the Senate to attempt to vote today upon the pending measure, and therefore I deem it proper to read this memorandum at this time. It reads as follows:

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO ENACT LEGISLATION HAVING RETROACTIVE, AS WELL AS PROSPECTIVE, EFFECT UPON RIGHTS CLAIMED UNDER PRIOR CONGRESSIONAL LEGISLATION

Specifically, this memorandum deals with the validity of possible legislation affecting the so-called Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. The power of Congress to legislate in regard to labor is derived from that clause of the Constitution giving it the power to regulate commerce among the States. Inasmuch as the Supreme Court in U. S. v. Darby (312 U. S. 100), has already upheld the congressional authority to enact the Fair Labor Standards Act itself, there can be no quetsion but that Congress may now legislate with reference to the same subject matter, provided of course its action does not violate any provision of the Constitution.

The proposed legislation is aimed at what are thought to be unjust consequences not only to employers, but indirectly, though certainly, unjust to the Nation as a whole, including workers themselves, and demoralizing to the general economy of the Nation.

I digress, Mr. President, to say that I think the beginning of the present bill indicates clearly that that is true.

I now read further from the memorandum:

The interpretations referred to above relate to the matter of compensation of workers for time spent in reaching the place of work and preparing for that work and referred to popularly, though inaccurately, as portal-to-portal compensation.

The section of the Fair Labor Standards Act with which the court was chiefly involved was section 7. The act makes no precise definition of what work and time are to be compensated for. No specific provision and, it is believed, no implied provision of the statute were intended to include compensation for time not spent in what is called productive work.

Prior to the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, it had not been customary to pay workers portal-to-portal pay except as provided for in specific contracts. There were a few such contracts, but in general it was not customary either by express contract or by informal agreement to pay for such work specifically, but it was apparently assumed that time spent in travel and in preparation for work were considered in fixing the hourly rate of pay.

The interpretations of the Fair Labor Standards Act referred to above began in the Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. v. Muscoda Local No. 123 (321 U. S. 590 (March 1944)). In that case, a majority of five of the Court held that the time spent by miners in traveling underground, to and from the working face, constituted work or employment for which the worker was entitled to compensation under the act. This was despite the fact that no proof was submitted that such travel time had ever been understood to be or had been compensated as work in the particular mine and area involved.

In Jewell River Coal Corp. v. Local No. 6167, U. M. W., et al. (325 U. S. 161 (May 1945)), the same majority of five justices held that time spent in travel underground between the portals and working face of a soft coal mine was compensable within the meaning of the act. It is worthy of note that the union involved had advised the Administrator that travel time had not before been recognized to be work time. The majority of the Court, however, had held that it made no difference that neither by custom nor by collective bargaining agreement such travel time had been excluded, and that neither contract nor custom could defeat or balk the declared policy of Congress that all actual work must be compensated and that travel time was included in such actual work.

In Armour & Co. v. Wantock (323 U. S. 126), and Skidmore v. Swift & Co. (323 U. S. 134), both decided in 1944, the Court decided that time spent by company firemen waiting "on call" in the company firehouse must be compensated.

In Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co. (66 S. Ct. 1187) again the same five Justices of the Supreme Court held that in addition to travel time, as defined in the decisions previously referred to here, the time spent in preparing for work, such as putting on protective devices, must also be paid for. As is well known after these decisions of the Supreme Court, a large number of suits were instituted to recover back "portal-to-portal" compensation; the amounts involved were large; and many more suits were threatened.

THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION

As this memorandum is written—

Of course, this memorandum was written before the bill was finally reported from the committee—

it cannot be stated what the anticipated legislation may contain—

However, Mr. President, I have examined the bill, and I may say that the questions presented in this memorandum cover the questions involved in the bill.

The dean says further:

But it may be, and is here, assumed that the legislation may include limitations on the time within which actions for portal-to-portal pay may be brought, provisions prohibiting the assignment of claims by workers, and giving to employers the defense of good faith and other provisions which would substantially affect the employees' rights of action in this field. Probably the legislation would contain retrospective features, as well as prospective.

Mr. President, I may say that this bill does contain retrospective features, and this memorandum discusses that question. So the questions involved in the bill are the ones discussed in the memorandum and, therefore, I believe they are material.

The memorandum further says:

The act prospectively employed, if reasonable and not violative of constitutional provisions, would certainly be valid, but question may be raised as to whether retroactive application of the proposed act would be valid.

Many laymen and some lawyers approach the question of retroactive legislation with the unwarranted feeling that such legislation is invalid, or, at least, frowned upon, because of the provision in the Constitution forbidding ex post facto laws. The term "ex post facto" is a term of art or a technical term well defined in the history of English and American governmental action, and it has been confined strictly to legislation (or, in England, other governmental action) relating to crimes. In this country it was early made clear, in the case of Calder v. Bull (3 Dall. 386), that the term "ex post facto" is confined to criminal matters. This interpretation of the expression is, of course, well known to the courts and the lawyers, but the opinion of Mr. Justice Iredell gives convincing reasons, aside from the historical ones, for holding that civil retroactive laws were not intended to be and should not be construed to be within the scope and meaning of the ex post facto prohibition.

Mr. Justice Iredell said (pp. 398, 400):

"The policy, the reason, and humanity, of the prohibition, do not, I repeat, extend to civil cases, to cases that merely affect the private property of citizens. Some of the most necessary and important acts of legislation are, on the contrary, founded upon the principle that private rights must yield to public exigencies."

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, has made an elaborate study of this matter of retroactive legislation. On page 772 of the eighth edition of this great work it is said:

"There are numerous cases which hold that retrospective laws are not obnoxious to constitutional objection, while in others they have been held to be void. The different decisions have been based upon diversities in the facts which make different principles applicable. There is no doubt of the right of the legislature to pass statutes which reach back to, and change or modify, the effect of prior transactions, provided retrospective laws are not forbidden by the State constitution, and provided further that no other objection exists to them than their retrospective character."

A large number of cases are cited to support the text. Among them are Shonk v. Brown (61 Pa. 320), Lane v. Nelson (79 Pa. St. 407), Miller v. Hixson (64 Ohio 39), Cummings v. Howard (63 Cal. 503).

The case of Goshen v. Stonington (4 Conn. 209) has become the leading case in this general class. The supreme court of the State sustained a statute which validated marriages which had been contracted under an older statute of the State. After the earlier statute, the courts held that the officiating clergyman had not been authorized to perform marriage ceremonies, and, therefore, that the supposed marriages were void. Several children were born of marriages thus nullified; property rights had been developed; and, in a few instances, support of indigents who had participated in these marriages had been put upon a certain Connecticut town. The effect of the statute, held valid in this case, was to make validly married persons who supposed they had been unmarried, so to speak, and had contracted other marriages. Of course, it affected the status of children born in this class, affected the property rights of all persons involved, and placed the support of some of the indigents upon towns other than those which had first been saddled with that support. In his opinion in this case, Chief Justice Hosmer said:

"It is universally admitted and unsusceptible of dispute that there may be retrospective laws impairing vested rights which are unjust * * *. On the other hand, laws of a retroactive nature affecting the rights of individuals not adverse to equitable principle and highly promotive of the general good have often been passed and as often approved. * * * On the other hand, I cannot harmonize with those who deny the power of the legislature to make laws in any case which with entire justice operate on antecedent legal rights."

Similar principles have been maintained by the Massachusetts courts. One of the most informing of the Massachusetts cases is Danforth v. Groton Water Co. (178 Mass. 472), in which the then Chief Justice Holmes sustained a statute which extended the time for filing suits under a prior short statute of limitations. Holmes frankly admitted that the effect of the statute was to deprive the city of the complete defense to the action, and hence to make valid a claim previously cut off. See also Robinson v. Robins Dry Dock Co. (230 N. Y. 271); Campbell v. Holt (115 U. S. 620). In the last-mentioned case, the court held that a repeal of the statute of limitations, even as to debts already barred, was valid and did not violate the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment.

Many such statutes enacted to correct irregularities or ambiguities in previous statutes have been appealed on the ground that they were retroactive. Both in England and in the United States, these statutes have been sustained, even though existing rights and claims were thereby destroyed.

In brief, it may be said with confidence that legislation cannot be held invalid, even though vested rights are thereby destroyed, merely on the ground that they are retroactive. They may be held invalid only because they offend some specific constitutional provision.

The proposed legislation in the portal-to-portal controversy is not declaratory. This conclusion seems incontrovertible, and the above discussion of declaratory legislation has the double aim of showing that if perchance the proposed legislation would be interpreted as declaratory, it would not on that account alone be invalid, and as showing that in any case where retrospective legislation is attached, it is permissible to show that though rights are destroyed, the legislation is constitutional unless definite injustice is thereby produced. For the purpose of further discussion, it is assumed that the proposed statute would not change the interpretation or decision in any cases already adjudicated. It would not in any manner affect adjudication already made, nor direct the courts how to interpret or apply statutes coming before them.

We proceed now to discuss other possible attacks upon the proposed legislation. Some retroactive legislation has been declared invalid because it impairs the obligation of contracts. The only prohibition of laws impairing the obligation of contracts is directed to the States and not to Congress, and, in many cases prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, the courts have distinctly held that the contract clause in the Constitution had no bearing whatever upon congressional legislation.

But in the case of the Continental-Illinois Bank & Trust Co. v. C. R. I. & P. R. Co. (294 U. S. 648), and in other cases cited in that opinion, the due-process clause has been construed to forbid the impairment of the obligation of contracts. Therefore, it is pertinent to consider here whether the proposed legislation would impair the obligation of contracts, and also whether it is in any other manner violative of due process of law.

The suggestions which have been made for legislation to deal with the portal-to-portal problem certainly include provisions which would in important respects affect some of the provisions in labor contracts, as the Fair Labor Standards Act has been interpreted in the Supreme Court decisions discussed earlier in this memorandum.

But it cannot be doubted that this interpretation by the Court differs widely from what had been the custom for many years in regard to compensable time spent in travel within the works or in preparation for work. It may well be doubted whether either the workers or employers believed prior to the Jewell Ridge case that time spent as indicated was compensable specifically. In fact, it had been assumed and had been found on the trial of the case in the lower court that travel time had not been recognized as a specific item, either in the custom or in special bargains. It was assumed that travel time was taken into account in fixing the regular hourly rate, and on that assumption, of course, travel time is paid for in that rate.

Whether we regard the Court's interpretation as correct or not, it certainly made a great change in the basis for reckoning compensation. This makes it clear that the workers' right to additional specific compensation for travel time was a new right born with the Court's interpretation. Legislation taking away a newly acquired and unexpected right is on a very different basis from rights of long standing, definitely and specifically covered by contract. This is recognized in the case of Campbell against Holt, cited above, and while the recognition of this difference between an old, specifically established right and a newly acquired right by unexpected court interpretation cannot be said to be a rule of law, yet it is a highly important consideration, oftentimes decisive, as revealed by many reported cases.

THE CLAIM TO COMPENSATION FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL TIME RESTS UPON THE STATUTE, AND THEREFORE FALLS WITH SUBSEQUENT REPEAL OR INCONSISTENT LEGISLATION

The principle just stated has been established almost from the beginning of our Government. (U. S. v. Schooner Peggy (1 Cranch 103); Norris v. Crocker (13 How. 429); Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Maxwell (237 U. S. 94).)

The case involving facts which most nearly parallel the facts in the present situation is National Carloading Corp. v. Phoenix-El Paso Express, Inc. (176 S. W. (2d) 564). Certiorari was denied in 322 U. S. 747, thus affirming the principle announced in the Texas case. The Texas court said (pp. 568–570):

"It is generally conceded that a right of action given by a statute may be taken away at any time even after it has accrued and proceedings have been commenced to enforce it. * * * A plaintiff does not possess such a vested right as to come within the inhibition of the fifth amendment. Such a right must be something more than a mere expectation based upon an anticipated continuance of the existing law. * * * If before rights become vested in particular individuals, the convenience of the State induces amendment or repeal of the laws upon which they are based, these individuals are left without any remedy at law to enforce their claims; and if final relief has not been granted before the repeal goes into effect, it cannot be granted thereafter, even if a judgment has been entered and the cause is pending upon appeal."

In Maryland v. B. & O. R. Co. (3 How. 534) the Supreme Court held that a valuable provision in an earlier statute, which provision was repealed subsequently, was destroyed by that repeal and without violation of the fifth amendment. See also Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Goldsboro (232 U. S. 548); Pearsall v. Great Northern R. Co. (161 U. S. 646).

That the right to compensation for travel and other work preparatory to the day's job is based wholly upon the statute is declared in Brooklyn Savings Bank v. O'Neil (324 U. S. 697), and the Court characterized it as a "statutory right conferred on a private party but affecting the public interest." It follows that this claim or right may be taken away by statute, and the new or curative statute may be given retroactive effect without violating the Constitution.

CONGRESS IN THE EXERCISE OF ONE OF ITS POWERS TO LEGISLATE FOR THE GENERAL WELFARE MAY DESTROY VESTED RIGHTS

It may well be doubted whether rights claimed under the interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act, in the Mount Clemens case, are vested except those which have been reduced to judgment, not subject to new trial or to appeal. And no such claims have been established by final judgment not subject to reversal or modification.

But even if it were assumed that in some manner rights to portal-to-portal pay have become vested, they are still subject to cancellation by acts of Congress. It has been held repeatedly that Congress, exercising one of the great powers conferred upon it for the general welfare, may destroy even vested rights which would otherwise stand as obstacles to the attainment of the policy declared by Congress. This has been true all through our history. In the exercise of its bankruptcy power Congress has subjected debts to cancellation or reduction and has been sustained in so doing by the Supreme Court in cases too numerous and too well known to require citation here.

Legal tender cases afford another well-known illustration of this power of Congress. See Juillard v. Green (110 U. S. 421). The most striking recent case illustrating this power of Congress is found in the so-called gold-contract cases. Norman v. B. & O. R. Co. (294 U. S. 240). In those cases Congress was exercising its granted power over currency. A joint resolution of Congress prohibiting the discharge of obligations in gold coin or currency was sustained by the Court as a valid exercise of congressional power. Several actions were instituted by the holders of gold-clause obligations, but the Court held that those clauses were subject to the power of Congress under the currency clause to regulate that currency. In his opinion for the Court, Chief Justice Hughes declared that:

"Contracts, however express, cannot fetter the constitutional authority of the Congress. Contracts may create rights of property, but when contracts deal with a subject matter which lies within the control of Congress, they have a congenital infirmity. Parties cannot remove their transactions from the reach of dominant constitutional power by making contracts about them" (pp. 307–308).

Substantially the same expression had been used by the Court in 1907 in the case of Hudson Water Co. v. McCarter (209 U. S. 349, 357). The same principle was expressed in different form in the Norman case, already referred to. There the Court said:

"There is no constitutional ground for denying to the Congress the power expressly to prohibit and invalidate contracts, although previously made and valid when made, when they interfere with the carrying out of the policy which it is free to make" (p. 309).

See Nortz v. U. S. (294 U. S. 317); The Gold Clause in United States Bonds, by Henry M. Hart, Jr. (48 Harvard Law Review 1056); Dickinson's The Gold Decisions (83 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 713, 723); Cyclopedia of American Government (vol. I, p. 456); Legal Aspects of Renegotiation, by Maj. Charles W. Steadman (42 Michigan Law Review 545).

The same principle as applied to State legislation was declared in the case of Home Building and Loan Association v. Blaisdell (290 U. S. 398, 429). Some effort was made in the last-named case to show that the statute complained of affected only remedy, but the remedies affected were substantial and the case was really decided on the ground that the State's police power amply justified dealing with a situation which was treated as an emergency.

In addition to the cases cited above on the congressional power, see American Power & Light Co. v. S. E. C. (15 Law Week 4013 (Nov. 25, 1946); Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. v. Schubert (224 U. S. 603); Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Mottley (219 U. S. 467); NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. (301 U. S. 1).

In the last-cited case, the Court said:

"The fundamental principle is that the power to regulate commerce is the power to enact all appropriate legislation for its protection and advancement * * * to adopt measures to promote its growth and insure its safety, to foster, protect, control, and restrain * * * that power is plenary and may be exerted to protect interstate commerce, no matter what the source of dangers which threaten it."

In North American Co. v. S. E. C., supra, the Court required the defendant to dispose of certain securities held by it. Defendant protested that this would compel it to sell the securities at a loss and thus deprive it of its property without due process of law. The Court disposed of that claim, saying:

"This broad commerce clause does not operate so as to render the Nation powerless to defend itself against economic forces that Congress decrees inimical or destructive of the national economy. Rather, it is an affirmative power commensurate with the national needs. It is unrestricted by contrary State laws or private contracts. And in using this great power, Congress is not bound by technical legal conceptions. * * * The taking of property is said to involve a vast destruction of values. Reference is made in this respect to the valuable right of North American shareholders to pool their investments and thereby obtain the benefit alleged to flow from efficient, common management of diversified interests. But Congress balanced the various considerations and concluded that this right is clearly outweighed by the actual and potential damage to the public, the investors, and the consumers resulting from the use made of pooled investments. * * * Congress has concluded from the extensive studies made prior to the passage of the act that the economic advantages of a holding company at the top of a disintegrated sprawling system are not commensurate with the resulting economic disadvantages. The reasonableness of that conclusion is one for Congress to determine. The fact that valuable interests may be affected does not by itself render invalid under the due process clause the determination made by Congress (pp. 797, 798).

In conclusion, it may be said:

1. That civil retroactive legislation is not invalid merely because it is retroactive;

2. Whether or not such legislation is constitutional or unconstitutional must be determined by considering the nature of the rights involved; the purpose for which the retroactive legislation is enacted; and the nature and purpose of the governmental power exerted;

3. Whether such legislation is absolutely prohibited by the Constitution must be determined;

4. It must be determined whether the proposed portal-to-portal legislation should be enacted to prevent injustice, to prevent injury to interstate commerce, to the economic condition of the country, and to the interest of employers, employees, and the general public;

5. That the proposed legislation does not impair the obligation of contracts when all the circumstances are considered; and

6. That the due process clause in the fifth amendment would not be violated.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. As I understand the memorandum from which the Senator has read was prepared by the able dean of the Michigan Law School.

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. It is a very illuminating and interesting memorandum, and the dean certainly spent a great amount of midnight oil in preparing it. I wonder whether the scholarly gentleman had before him a full copy of the bill as reported from the committee on March 10?

Mr. FERGUSON. In the beginning of my remarks I stated that he did not; but I considered that the principle discussed by him does apply to the bill.

Mr. LUCAS. I certainly agree with the Senator that it applies to the main part of the bill, certainly to the portal-to-portal suits, as so ably discussed in the brief submitted by the erudite gentleman. There seems to be little question about that. But I am wondering whether or not the dean of the Michigan Law School would give the Senator the same kind of opinion if he were dealing with a basis claim or contract right which had absolutely nothing to do with portal-to-portal activities.

Mr. FERGUSON. I would have to get a little clearer answer on that point from the memorandum itself. Is the Senator speaking of a right created under the Fair Labor Standards Act?

Mr. LUCAS. It might involve a claim under the Fair Labor Standards Act, but if I am rightly informed, under the provisions of the bill it does not make any difference whether such a claim comes under the Fair Labor Standards Act; it could arise under the Walsh-Healey Act, it could arise under the Bacon-Davis Act, or the bill goes so far as to cover any kind of claim. That is the point at which I part company with the pending bill.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the Senator give me the benefit of the particular clause or provision of the bill to which he has reference when he speaks of any kind of claim under other acts?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not assert that what I said represents the exact language of the bill, but I will find the language for the Senator in a moment. On page 10 of the bill, part II, section 2 (a):

> No employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act on account of the failure of such employer to pay an employee minimum wages, or to pay an employee overtime compensation, for or on account of any activities of an employee engaged in prior to the date of enactment of this act—

And so on. My contention is that under this section every conceivable claim based on any activity not compensable by contract or by custom or practice, as is provided in paragraphs (1) and (2), is wiped out. That is my position. I may be wrong in my position.

Mr. FERGUSON. No; I think th Senator is right.

Mr. LUCAS. If my position is correct I seriously contend that the Congress of the United States cannot arbitrarily wipe out a basic claim which has no relation whatever to portal-to-portal activities, and, in addition to that, which does not in anywise affect the interstate commerce clause upon which this proposed legislation is based.

Mr. FERGUSON. I answer by saying that it is the intent of the section referred to abolish every known claim that could exist under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act—specifically under the acts and by virtue of nothing else than the acts, except claims which may arise under any express or implied contract. It wipes out all claims that are specifically provided for in the acts referred to. I think it was the intention of the drafters of the legislation to wipe out everything under those acts that was not based upon contract or custom or practice. That was the intention.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct, and I say it is debatable and it is legitimate argument, I think, whether or not the Congress of the United States can arbitrarily dispose of a claim which might arise under the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act or any other act that does not directly affect the portal-to-portal cases which we know as the only reason for this proposed legislation. In other words, without these portal-to-portal suits having been started all over the country we know that we would not have before us any legislation dealing with the Bacon-Davis Act or the Walsh-Healey Act or with any legitimate claim that might arise under contract or under practice or custom.

So my only point—and I have raised it a couple of times in the course of the debate—is whether or not under the Constitution Congress has the power to wipe out a vested right which in nowise affects the commerce clause of the Constitution. There is no evidence before us today that anything that has happened under the Bacon-Davis Act or the Walsh-Healey Act has in anywise affected the economy of the country or in anywise disturbed the commerce clause of the Constitution upon which this proposed legislation is based.

Mr. FERGUSON. I think that is a fair question and one which should be debated here. The bill certainly embraces those acts, whether or not cases involved under them are portal-to-portal cases. I think personally the designation "portal to portal" is rather a misnomer. But as we begin consideration of the question we agree that the Fair Labor Standards Act has been declared constitutional. I do not have any citations before me to show that the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act have been declared constitutional, but I assume, because of the length of time they have been on the statute books, that they have been so declared. Therefore those acts are valid, and they rest upon certain constitutional powers, just as the Fair Labor Standards Act rests on the commerce clause.

This legislation involves a question of policy. Congress having created a right by a law which has been declared to be constitutional, under the decisions of the courts Congress may take away that right. Congress may take away any right which it creates by legislative enactment. That is what the courts have said. If Congress declares certain rights to exist, a new Congress—or even the same Congress, on the same day, but subsequent to the enactment of the act—may take away such rights. That is the judicial interpretation of our Constitution.

The able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] brought up the question of the so-called good-faith section. I believe that this section should be included in the bill. We have so much regulation and regimentation in America that I think that when the Government of the United States undertakes to issue regulations and tell the people what they can do, if the people in good faith comply with such regulations they should be protected. I would not for a moment say that anyone who does anything in bad faith, or whose actions are tainted with bad faith, should have any protection. But when the Congress enacts laws and the executive branch employs administrators who tell the people what they can do, and the people with whom they are dealing understand the regulations and act in good faith, the Government should not come along years later and say, "No matter that you acted in absolute good faith, no matter how innocently you may have proceeded, we are going to hold you liable for breaching the contract, and you will have to pay as a penalty, not only time and a half, but double time and a half." A man may be entitled to time and a half; but the statute provides that the employer who breaches a contract is liable not only for time and a half, but for twice that amount, plus attorneys' fees. I do not see how a nation can say to its citizens, after they have relied upon administrative interpretations, "The public servant who issued the order did not know what he was doing, and therefore we will hold you liable for a penalty."

This proposal was before the Seventy-ninth Congress and there was not a dissenting vote against it. I was instrumental in proposing the amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act. Representatives of both management and labor came to me and said, "Under the circumstances we all acted in good faith for the war effort. We now understand that there has been a change, because of a Supreme Court decision which would wreck this entire industry." The amendment which was then proposed was unanimously agreed to, so that certain rights would be protected. The amendment consisted of the addition of subsection (b) to section 2 of the act. The amendment was as follows:

> (b) No liability under this section shall be predicated in any case on any act done or omitted in good faith in accord with any regulation, order, or administrative interpretation or practice, notwithstanding that such regulation, order, interpretation, or practice may, after such act or omission, be amended, rescinded, or be determined by judicial authority to be invalid or of no legal effect.

That was on July 29, 1946.

The question is whether or not the Government will permit persons concerned to rely in good faith upon the interpretation of an administrator duly authorized by statute to issue regulations. Such protection is particularly important in wartime, when the people are trying to follow the orders of administrators and produce the maximum amount of goods to aid in defeating a common enemy. When Congress has provided for such regulations, and the people in good faith have relied upon them, it seems to me that the Congress, the representatives of the people themselves, should protect those who in good faith rely upon such orders. It will be of even greater importance if we ever have another crisis such as the last war.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. Does the Senator agree with this observation of the Supreme Court of the United States in Missel v. Overnight Motor Transportation Company (316 U. S. 572):

> Is this provision of the law as to liquidated damages mandatory or discretionary? Since the act has been violated in good faith in this case, we would indeed like to hold that it is discretionary. It seems a keen injustice for employers bewildered by strange legislation and confused by divergent authority of the courts to be subjected to such a measure. Yet, no matter how much we lament its harshness, the section appears to be mandatory and virtually all the courts have so construed it.

Does the Senator agree as to the inate position of justice there suggested by the Court?

Mr. FERGUSON. I certainly do. That is an example of the way the courts are placed in such a position that they are helpless, no matter how earnestly they may desire to do equity, no matter how much they may wish to do justice between the parties. We have provided for so much damages, and by virtue of the law the courts must live up to that provision. What the Congress is trying to do is what the judge would have liked to do if he had had his choice, and that is to do justice. That is what we want in America, but I would like to see it done under law. The judge could not do justice because the law prohibited it. I say that we ought to change the law so that justice can be done under the law.

Mr. DONNELL subsequently said: Mr. President, during the progress of the address of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], in reading at the moment from Report No. 1395, Seventyninth Congress, second session, I credited a certain quotation which I read to the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Missel v. Overnight Motor Transportation Company (316 U. S. 572). I have ascertained that while the citation appears that way in the report from which I read, and was a correct quotation, the citation was incorrect. The language which I quoted is from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, appearing in One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Federal, second series, at pages 110 and 111. I should like to have the RECORD also show that the citation which I gave from the Supreme Court is a citation of the decision of the Supreme Court in which the ruling of the circuit court of appeals to which I have referred was affirmed.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, as a member of the Senate Labor Committee, back in 1937, when the Black-Connery bill was before the Congress, I became deeply interested in the problems of the unorganized workers of our country. That bill was finally enacted as the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. The operation of that law in the meantime has met with the general approval of the people of this country.

I am therefore concerned over the disastrous effects which the so-called portal-to-portal bill now being considered will have on the Fair Labor Standards Act which has made a signal contribution to the welfare of our country and its unorganized workers.

It seems to me that the plain implication of the bill now being considered will be to undermine and destroy the present modest standards of wages and living and working conditions prevailing for the vast body of unorganized workers.

The testimony before the Senate committee on the Black-Connery bill related a tragic story of the degradation and oppression of those unfortunate workers who were without any organization to protect their rights. The depressing effects of those conditions were threatening to undermine our entire American economic system. Nearly one-third of our entire population was affected by these conditions, which forced the Congress to take action which resulted in the fair labor standards measure.

With the impact of the industrial revolution, this country, like other industrialized countries, had developed in its midst a new class of propertyless, exploited, and desperately depressed workers. As we grew in industrial might we saw, growing side by side, industrial slums, disease, and poverty. Poverty and want existed in the midst of plenty. Men, women, and children were forced to live under the most shameful conditions; their earnings, in most cases, were less than sufficient to maintain themselves in any degree of comfort or good health. The plight of these unfortunate children and workers had been the subject of discussion in forums, in books, and in muckracking stories in the press, both in America and other nations where similar conditions existed.

The poetry of Thomas Hood portrayed the sad conditions of the workers in the textile industry in England, which applied as well to America. The school children of England and of this country, half a century ago, used to recite Hood's poem, The Song of the Shirt, depicting the sad plight of the workers—one of the stanzas of which reads, as follows:

Stitch, stitch, stitch, in poverty, hunger, and dirt,
Sewing at once, with a double thread, a shroud as well as a shirt.

Little or nothing, however, was being done to change these conditions in America until the great depression following the Wall Street crash of 1929 came upon us.

A great deal of lip service had been given to the commonplace that: "It is bad for America, economically as well as socially, to have child labor, sweated labor, low standards of living, inhumane and unhealthy working conditions."

But little in the way of remediale legislation was seriously proposed until 1934 when President Roosevelt recommended the enactment of the National Recovery Administration.

The NRA provided for a code of fair competition, including maximum hours and minimum wages for workers. However, this act was declared unconstitutional and in 1937 President Roosevelt, conscious of the great need of action, urged the Congress to enact the fair-labor standards bill providing for minimum wages, maximum hours, and the abolition of unhealthy child labor conditions. It was in his now-famous message on this legislation that President Roosevelt referred to the "one-third of our population being ill-nourished, ill-clad, and ill-housed." He recommended, in a vigorous message to the Congress, that some concrete steps be promptly taken to make the devotion to the verbal ideals I have mentioned statutory instead of merely rhetorical.

I shall not take the time here to discuss the effects of that outstanding example of American humane legislation—the Fair Labor Standards Act—it was successful beyond expectations. It not only brought justice to a terribly exploited section of our people, but made an effective contribution to business and industry by providing a more healthy and productive working force, and by creating improved markets and more balanced and prosperous conditions in the country.

Mr. President, in view of what I have related, I am naturally alarmed over the effect which the legislation now being considered, H. R. 2157, will have on that most beneficent measure.

Although H. R. 2157 purports to merely outlaw so-called portal-to-portal wage claims and carries the innocent title of Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, it contains provisions which will cause the unorganized employees, of whom there are more than 9,000,000 covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act alone, to lose the protection of decent wages and reasonable working hours obtained for them by the Fair Labor Standards Act. Other laws also protecting and safeguarding the working men and women of the country would likewise be adversely affected by the enactment of H. R. 2157.

In considering the drastic changes this bill would make in these labor statutes, we must recall the remedial and humanitarian purposes which Congress had in mind in enacting them and the economic conditions which surrounded their passage. Statistics compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics and presented during 1937 to the joint committee which was considering the then pending Fair Labor Standards Act revealed that 20 percent of the wage-earning families in New York City had a combined income of less than $1,200 a year. Less than a $1,200-a-year income was earned by 29 percent of the wage-earning families in Philadelphia, 26 percent in Pittsburgh, 25 percent in St. Louis, and 20 percent in Los Angeles. In Providence, R. I., 42½ percent of all families earned less than $1,200 a year, 30 percent of all white families in Atlanta earned less than that sum, and for Denver the figure was 35 percent. The percentage of families earning less than a yearly income of $1,200 was uniformly higher in the smaller cities and towns. Figures supplied to the joint committee in 1937 revealed that 36.7 percent of all industrial employees were receiving less than 40 cents an hour, and that about 50 percent of them were working more than 40 hours a week.

Working time of more than 70 hours a week in some instances were reported to the joint committee. Wages of 15 cents and less an hour, it was revealed, were not uncommon in cigarette factories, paper-box factories, sawmills, wood-heel factories, and container factories. In 1936, the median weekly wage for women employed in manufacturing industries in Arkansas was $9.60, with the average for some industries being as low as $5.55 a week. Of the women in Arkansas industries covered by the survey, 24.1 percent worked more than 48 hours a week, and an additional 27.4 percent were employed more than 40 hours a week. In Delaware, more than 41 percent of the women employed in manufacturing earned less than $10 per week. Similar statistics could be cited regarding women employed in Tennessee, Texas, and several other States.

These appalling conditions, Mr. President, convinced Congress that there was a vast body of workers in this country who were unable to secure by their own means a living wage and reasonable hours of employment. In enacting the Fair Labor Standards Act, in 1938, the Congress found in its findings and declaration of policy the existence "of labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standards of living necessary for health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers," resulting in burdens upon commerce, interference with the orderly and fair marketing of goods in commerce, and unfair methods of competition in commerce. It was declared to be the policy of the act "to correct and as rapidly as practicable to eliminate" such conditions. The Supreme Court, in considering the legislative history of the Fair Labor Standards Act and its findings and declaration of policy, has stated that the statute is remedial in nature, with a humanitarian purpose, and that it was intended by Congress "to protect certain groups of the population from substandard wages and excessive hours which endangered the national health and well-being." The Walsh-Healey Act and the Davis-Bacon Act were enacted for similar purposes.

In the years which have passed since the enactment of these remedial statutes, their value in raising the working standards of the unorganized worker has been clearly demonstrated. Although the union employee has normally been able to protect his interests through collective bargaining, the millions of unorganized and unskilled workers have had to depend upon these statutes to secure and maintain decent wages and reasonable hours of work. The average weekly wage of factory workers, including both organized and unorganized, rose from $23.86 in 1939 to a high of $46.08 in 1944. This average dropped to $41.81 in August 1945, the last period for which I have any figures. These statistics and others compiled on the subject indicate that as the peak period of employment created by war conditions subsides, the unorganized worker will again have to rely upon these labor statutes to maintain a standard of living sufficient to cover essential human needs.

The argument may be advanced by those supporting this bill that decent wages and reasonable working hours, having been established under the Fair Labor Standards Act and these other statutes, will continue to be paid by industry to the unorganized, as well as the organized, employee, even though the remedial provisions of these statutes are seriously impaired by House bill 2157 or other legislation. Fortunately, however, we do not have to speculate or attempt to surmise as to the results which would follow from the repeal or removal of working standards established under Federal legislation. The Bureau of Labor Statistics has made an exhaustive and remarkable study of the effects upon wages and working hours which resulted after the National Recovery Act was declared invalid. It will be recalled that under that act codes of fair competition establishing minimum wages and maximum hours of employment were adopted in various industries. The NRA was declared invalid on May 27, 1935. The Bureau of Labor Statistics found that within 1 year after the codes were nullified average weekly hours increased substantially in all 16 of the industries examined. In the steel industry, for example, only 3 percent of the employees worked more than 40 hours a week during May 1935, the last month under the code; but 1 year later, during May 1936, over 67 percent of the workers, or 20 times that many, were employed for more than 40 hours a week. In the hardwood industry only one-tenth of the workers in May 1935 were employed more than 40 hours a week, but in May 1936 over two-thirds of the employees were working more than 40 hours per week. In the cotton-garments industry the number of employees working over 40 hours a week increased from 4 percent in 1935 to 41 percent in 1936. Similar statistics were found in the other industries studied. It was estimated that if the code hours had been maintained 6 percent more workers would have been employed in those industries.

The second factor revealed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics' study of the National Recovery Act was that the employers paying the lowest wages were the most prone to increase the number of hours in the working week, thus forcing their workers to depend upon a longer workweek, rather than on wage rates, for maintaining their weekly incomes. For example, 1 year after the nullification of the codes, the workers in the cotton-garments industry worked 13.9 percent more hours, but their pay roll fell 1.2 percent. In the silk and rayon industry the number of employees was reduced by 1.3 percent, but there was a 4-percent increase in man-hours worked; further, the weekly earnings of the wage earners in that industry fell 1.4 percent. It was also found that the establishments in that industry paying the lowest wages in 1935 under the code made the largest wage cuts after the nullification of the code.

Another significant factor was revealed in that study of the National Recovery Act: The industries which increased the length of the working week and decreased the hourly rate of pay were placed at such a great competitive advantage over their competitors who attempted to maintain code standards that the latter had a hard time staying in business. In the cotton-garment industry, firms which reduced wages by 37 percent or more increased their volume of business by more than 60 percent, while firms which did not cut wages suffered a substantial loss of business.

If the remedial provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and the other labor statutes are seriously impaired—and I intend to demonstrate shortly that House bill 2157 will have that effect—there is every reason to believe the lengthening of the workweek and the reduction of hourly rates of pay which followed the nullification of the National Recovery Act codes will occur again. The conditions which led to the passage of those remedial statutes will return. Although wages may remain higher than they were at the time when those statutes were enacted, the tremendous increase in the cost of living will leave as large a percentage of wage-earning families with a subnormal standard of living as before. Further, the study of the National Recovery Act codes revealed that the firms paying the lowest wages under the codes took advantage of their nullification to cut wages even further, indicating that if the labor standards established by the Fair Labor Standards Act and the other statutes are impaired, the burden will fall primarily upon the poorly paid unskilled and unorganized worker.

Mr. President, the maintaining of a decent wage benefits not only the individual worker and his family, but also the whole community. It is a well-known fact that when the purchasing power of the wage earner is increased, he buys additional food, clothing, household equipment, and better housing facilities, and he can afford better medical and dental care. That is especially true in regard to the poorly paid worker, who will use any increase in his income for necessities. A very extensive study was made during 1941 by Jack Chernick, of the University of Minnesota, concerning the effects of the Hormel annual wage plan upon the city of Austin, Minn., the home of the Hormel meat-packing plant. He found that the increased wages and increased security received by Hormel employees under that plan had a marked effect upon the economy of Austin: The population and school enrollment rapidly increased; newspaper circulation and advertising advanced; bank deposits soared; there was a substantial increase in the number of families using public utilities and in the sales of the public utilities; residential and nonresidential building, as well as retail, wholesale and service trade, greatly increased; and the revenue collected by the city grew. Since most of those advances were not experienced by neighboring Minnesota cities, Chernick concluded that they were caused in Austin, which is a one-plant town, by the improvement in wages and security of the Hormel employees.

Conversely, where employees are paid a substandard wage and are no longer able to support themselves and their families, the community suffers. If the wage earner has insufficient money to buy food and clothing, the storekeepers suffer a loss in business and the manufacturers throughout the country lose their markets. Relief must be provided for the unemployed and poorly paid, constituting a tremendous drain upon the community and the country. Thus, Mr. President, the welfare of the worker, especially of the unskilled, poorly paid worker, adversely affects every person and every company in the country. Insofar as H. R. 2157 impairs the decent wage which Congress intended to grant him under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, and the Davis-Bacon Act, every man, woman, and child also suffers.

Mr. President, a careful study of H. R. 2157 can leave little doubt that it seriously jeopardizes the position of the unorganized worker under the Fair Labor Standards Act and these other statutes. Consider, for instance, his position under the 2-year statute of limitations which the bill would place upon future suits brought by employees for recovery of unpaid wages. Although the need for a uniform period of limitations governing suits brought under section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act is recognized by all, a 2-year period gives the unorganized worker insufficient time in which to protect his statutory rights. It must be remembered that such an employee has no knowledge of the complicated legal problems involved in determining whether he comes within the coverage of any or all of these acts, and if he is covered, whether he is excluded from their benefits by one or more of their many exemptions. Secondly, he has no way of learning pertinent facts concerning his employer's business, such as the type of contract under which the employer is operating, the sources of his raw materials, and the destination of the finished product. These factors, which often change from week to week, must be known before the employee's status under these acts can be determined. The third reason which might delay the worker in bringing his action for unpaid wages is the fact that he does not keep any record of the hours he works at each particular job, but, rather, must rely upon the records which his employer is required by law to maintain. Further, the unorganized employee may delay bringing his suit for fear of losing his job, and in many instances he will not risk bringing his action until after he has ceased working for that employer. This fact was emphasized by several witnesses appearing before the committee considering this measure.

Lastly, the expense of bringing an individual action for unpaid wages often causes the unorganized employee to wait until others with claims against the same employer unite in engaging counsel and assuming court costs. All these factors combine to make it practically impossible, in most situations, for the unorganized employees who do not have the protection and guidance of a labor organization to bring his action for wages within the period of 2 years. It is needless to add that if he is prevented by practical circumstances from bringing his action for wages within the statutory period of limitations, the remedial benefits granted him under the Fair Labor Standards Act and other statutes are of little value.

Furthermore, a 2-year statute of limitations would make enforcement of these labor statutes an almost impossible task. The Wage and Hour Administrator has indicated that with his limited staff and funds, any given establishment cannot be inspected more than once every 10 years. Accordingly, a chiseling employer would be encouraged by a 2-year statute of limitations to violate these acts, confident that the period of limitations in regard to any particular violation would almost certainly have expired before the violation was detected. The employee suit is a necessary implement for enforcement, so that if its effectiveness is substantially reduced by a short statute of limitation the possibility of adequate enforcement is highly speculative.

If H. R. 2157 were to be enacted into law, the worker would find his rights under the Fair Labor Standards Act and these other statutes affected by such terms as "principal activity," "customs or practice," "good faith," "practice of the Administrator" and equally vague and ambiguous terms. He certainly would have no idea from reading the 16 pages of the bill what changes had been made in his status under these labor statutes. He has the alternative of either accepting the interpretation his employer places on the act or undertaking litigation, which, in view of the ambiguities in H. R. 2157, would very likely end up in the United States Supreme Court. Faced with these alternatives, there is little question that the unorganized worker will take his employer's word for the effect of H. R. 2157 upon his rights—giving the unethical employer a perfect opportunity for evasion of the Fair Labor Standards Act and these other labor statutes.

Under the provisions of H. R. 2157, an employee would not in the future be paid for sharpening tools, carrying them from his reporting place to his work assignment, changing into protective clothing, or any other work which does not constitute his "principal activity," unless such work were compensable under the express provisions of a contract, or in accordance with custom or practice. A moments reflection makes it clear that the burden of this unfair provision will fall squarely upon the unorganized and unskilled worker. Where the employee is represented by a union, the collective-bargaining agreement will normally provide that compensation shall be paid for some or all of these make-ready activities, but the unorganized worker does not have the bargaining power to obtain any such agreement.

Insofar as "custom or practice" is concerned, no attempt is made in H. R. 2157 to explain what these terms are intended to cover, their vagueness extending an open invitation to the employer hiring unorganized employees to evade the humanitarian purposes of the Fair Labor Standards Act and these other labor acts. In a situation where such an employer is presently paying for makeready time or similar work, he can sell or lease his present plant to a brother-in-law or to a dummy corporation, which as a new employer would not be bound by the past, and could establish new customs or practices. Or, since his unorganized employees will probably be unable to resist such a change, he can exert the necessary pressure to obtain an express modification of the employment agreement which, being inconsistent with his previous practice of paying for such work, would effectively eliminate payment for such work thereafter, and thus reduce the minimum compensation which he would be required under the act to pay for the employees' existing workweek.

The sum effect of this provision in H. R. 2157 is that the unorganized worker, for whose protection and benefit the Fair Labor Standards Act and these other statutes were enacted, would be unpaid for certain types of work, while the organized employee would receive compensation for the same kind of activities. This result is completely contrary to the purpose of Congress in enacting these labor statutes, namely, to aid unskilled and unorganized workers in securing the decent wage which they cannot obtain through their own efforts. Furthermore, it gives an unfair competitive advantage to the employer hiring unorganized labor.

H. R. 2157 would make noncompensable all activities, no matter how onerous or burdensome they may be, which are performed preliminary to or postliminary to the employee's principal activity. This unfair provision will not only greatly weaken the labor standards provided by Federal labor statutes but will also have a serious effect upon the scores of State laws and municipal ordinances regulating minimum wages and maximum hours. An example is the effect this provision will produce upon the labor standards in Montana. The Constitution and a statute in my State, to protect the health and welfare of underground miners, provide that 8 hours shall constitute a day's work in underground mines, as well as in several other industries.

In 1941, the Butte Miners' Union No. 1, representing about 5,000 miners sought an injunction to restrain their employer from working them more than 8 hours a day. The facts presented in the case indicated that, in addition to working a full 8 hours in mining copper, the miners spent from three-quarters of an hour to one and a half hours each day in procuring tools and equipment, awaiting transportation and being transported down the shafts into the mines, returning up the shafts at night and bringing back their tools and equipment.

When the case reached the Supreme Court of Montana—Butte Miners' Union No. 1 v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., (118 P. (2d) (148)—that court took cognizance of the interpretation adopted under the Fair Labor Standards Act that operations of the type I have enumerated constitute hours worked when performed by underground metal miners. The court indicated that theoretically a contrary interpretation could be given to the Montana constitution and statute, but that for all practical purposes the result of doing so would be inconsistent and chaotic. It pointed out the great confusion into which both employer and employee would be thrown by that result, and the practical difficulties facing the employer if hours worked meant one thing under the Federal statute and something different under the State law. The court stated that its only choice, in order to avoid a chaotic condition under our dual form of government, is to adopt a like interpretation of our own statutory and constitutional provisions, in the mutual interest of labor, industry, and the general public. Accordingly the employer was enjoined by the court from working the miners more than 8 hours a day, including the time spent securing and returning equipment and traveling into and out of the mines.

If H. R. 2157 were adopted in its present form, the reasoning employed by the Montana Supreme Court in the above case would seem to require that it change its interpretation of the State law to bring that interpretation into conformity with Federal law, thereby causing the underground miners to lose the remedial benefits of the State law as well as of the Federal statutes. Unquestionably, there are many other instances where State laws and municipal ordinances establishing labor standards have been interpreted by the courts and local administrative bodies in conformity with Federal law regarding hours worked. Consequently, the adoption of H. R. 2157 will not only affect the rights of millions of workers under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, and the Davis-Bacon Act but also the rights of many additional millions under State and local laws.

In addition to the adverse effect this provision of H. R. 2157 would have upon the miners in Montana, it would make noncompensable many burdensome activities performed for the employer by employees in the lumbering, smeltering, and petroleum-refining industries in my State. In logging operations, the employees travel several miles through almost trackless forests to the work site, usually burden with axes, saws, and other equipment. More than an hour a day is often consumed in making the trip to and from the cutting area. Is the worker to be denied recovery for this work, which requires exertion performed for the benefit of the employer's business and usually on the employer's property?

In sawmilling and logging, the employees perform the following auxiliary duties, among others, which might not be part of their principal activity and may be performed at the beginning or end of a shift: Oiling setworks, gears, and block skids; changing and greasing saws; rolling out rolls and line skids; figuring shortages; oiling and adjusting the resaw; changing edger and slashing saws; completing scale sheets; and preparing operating records. Does H. R. 2157 deny recovery for all of these duties, which might not constitute the employee's principal activity, and each of which requires from 15 minutes to an hour to perform? Are employees in the petroleum-refining industry to receive any compensation for the length of time it takes each day for them to be assigned tools and walk a considerable distance to their work place, and for the time spent at the end of the day on such activities?

Examples of the unfairness of H. R. 2157, in removing such auxiliary activities from the remedial benefits of the Fair Labor Standards Act and these other Federal statutes, could be increased a hundredfold, drawn from the industries functioning in Montana or from the industries in any other State of the Union.

Further, it is important to remember that the effect of this provision will fall most heavily upon the unorganized worker, who does not have the bargaining power to secure from his employer an agreement that compensation will be paid for such work.

Another provision of H. R. 2157 which will work to the serious detriment of the unorganized employees is the so-called "good faith" provision. This section would give the employer a complete defense to actions brought under the Fair Labor Standards Act and these other labor acts where in good faith he acted in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice of the Wage and Hour Administrator, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice is amended, rescinded, or determined by the courts to be invalid. You will notice that the employer can plead this defense even though he has not relied upon an administrative interpretation or practice; it is sufficient if his acts were actually in accord with such interpretation or practice, whether or not he has previously heard of it. The bill does not define what is meant by "practice," but it is conceivable that the term includes an unauthorized statement made by a Government inspector to any employer, not necessarily the one claiming the good-faith defense. I should like to know, too, if this section would grant immunity to an employer merely because his plant was not inspected by the Wage and Hour Division, if it should appear that the Administrator, in order to obtain the most efficient use of inspection personnel, had followed the practice of inspecting only those establishments in the employer's industry against whom complaints were received?

In an action brought under these labor statutes, the unethical employer—who, unfortunately, has not yet been entirely eliminated from industry—could plead that in failing to comply with the provisions of these statutes, he acted in reliance on an interpretation or practice that he heard about and which he considered pertinent to his situation. When the employees are represented by a well-organized and wide-awake union, they may be able, through their legal counsel and the facts at their disposal, to cast some doubt upon such an employer's alleged good faith. I cannot, however, imagine how the unorganized workers, with their limited means, can possibly refute or cast doubt upon the good faith which their employers might claim to have had. The possibility of fradulent evasions is increased by the fact that unorganized workers, much more so than union employees, have to deal with that minority of employers who are unethical and who are willing to use any scheme in order to evade paying a decent wage, and thus gain an unfair advantage over their ethical competitors.

Thus, Mr. President, the remedial benefits granted to employees under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act and the Davis-Bacon Act would be seriously jeopardized by certain provisions in H. R. 2157—by its short period of limitations, by the great difficulties it places in the way of enforcement of these acts, by the uncertainty and confusion it creates, by its making noncompensable several kinds of actual work performed by employees and by the invitation to fraud contained in its "good faith" provision. These provisions go far beyond the so-called portal-to-portal problem. As I have pointed out, the Fair Labor Standards Act and these other labor statutes were enacted by Congress primarily for the purpose of guaranteeing millions of unskilled and unorganized workers in this country a decent wage and reasonable working hours, benefits which the past has proven they are unable to obtain by their own efforts. These statutes, in operation, have achieved their purpose, but if they are to be emasculated by the passage of H. R. 2157, we know from the experience following nullification of the National Recovery Act codes that the unorganized and unskilled worker will lose all the benefits he has acquired under these statutes, and that his standard of living and working conditions will revert to the deplorable conditions existing before passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act and these other statutes. Not only the worker and his family but the whole community will suffer as a result.

Mr. President, it was the weakened situation of labor, its inability to secure decent living wages and working conditions, and its consequent lowered purchasing power following the First World War which contributed to the economic break-down and prolonged depression in the thirties. This was effectively pointed out by Mr. Harold E. Stassen in his testimony before the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee at its hearings on February 7, 1947, where he testified as follows:

> I think it is important that we remember the experience of 1920 to 1929. In 1920 the average wages in the 25 industries in this country that were sampled, were 61 cents an hour. In 1921 and 1922 those wages were driven down to 49 cents an hour, a drop of 12 cents. Then we went through the boom up to 1929, and they still only got up to an average of 59 cents an hour. And that lag behind of wages of workers had with it the knocking down of union membership from 5,000,000 to 3,400,000 membership. So that you had your profits rising rapidly in industry, your total production going up to new highs, but wages held down below the 1920 level, and I think that is the result of too much weakness on the part of labor organizations.
> That is one of the factors that caused the 1929 break, as I see it, and as some eminent economists have analyzed it. * * *
> The labor proportion of the total national product had gone down from 1920 to 1929. In other words, in 1929, gross national product was 99,000,000,000. And, still, you had labor at only 53,000,000,000—total salary and wages. This holding back of consuming power during that boom rise of the late 1920's was one of the factors. * * *
> I would say, specifically, that in my judgment, and from the statistics that are available, wages lagged behind in the 1920's the increase of productivity of labor.
> Even if you were to give labor its fair credit for the increase in productivity, wages during that period should have gone up more than they did.

Mr. President, for the reasons I have stated, I am opposed to the pending bill in its present form, and will be constrained to vote against it as dangerous and ill-conceived legislation.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, yesterday I discussed an amendment which I had sent to the desk and which has been printed and is now on the table. At the conclusion of my remarks the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] said he personally was willing to accept the amendment, but the parliamentary situation prevented him from doing so because it was necessary that the full committee approve the amendment, which would be a modification of the Senate committee amendment.

So at this time Mr. President, I send to the desk a perfecting amendment to my amendment which I have not yet offered, but which I have had printed, and which lies on the table. I ask that the perfecting amendment may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALDWIN in the chair). The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 7, of Mr. WHERRY'S amendment, it is proposed to strike out "on or after" and insert in lieu thereof "prior to, on, or after", and in line 10 to strike out "the Administrator of said act" and insert in lieu thereof "the Secretary of Labor or any Federal official utilized by him to assist in the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the perfecting amendment would simply insert on page 2, line 7, of my amendment the same language as that contained in the first paragraph of my amendment, paragraph (d), and on page 2, line 10, it would strike out the words "administrator of said act" and insert the words "the Secretary of Labor," and other words, because the Secretary of Labor is the administrator of the act.

I modify my amendment accordingly, Mr. President, and ask that the amendment, as modified, be adopted. I understand there is no objection to the amendment from the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], and I talked to the acting minority leader yesterday afternoon and understood there was no objection on his part.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, that statement is correct as to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I was under a misapprehension with respect to the amendment. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I thought he was talking about another amendment, which dealt with a matter we were discussing concerning the elimination of the word "practice," but I did not know that the Senator was going so far as to include the Secretary of Labor and other officials in connection with orders which may have been issued.

Mr. WHERRY. That was not in my original amendment. That is simply to perfect the language of the committee amendment, which uses the word "administrator" in the first paragraph. In the second paragraph the words "administrator of said act" should be eliminated, and the words "Secretary of Labor" inserted. The Senator objected to the words "administrative agencies."

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I invite attention to the fact that under the Walsh-Healey Act there is no individual designated by the statute under the title of "administrator." However, there is this language in subdivision 4 of 49 Statutes, 2038:

> The Secretary of Labor is hereby authorized and directed to administer the provisions of sections 35 to 45 of this title, and to utilize such Federal officers and employees, and, with the consent of the State, such State and local officers and employees, as he may find necessary to assist in the administration of said section, and to prescribe rules and regulations with respect thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, what the Senator from Nebraska proposes to do is to make certain changes in the amendment which he planned to offer, which in turn would amend the committee amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska offer his amendment as modified?

Mr. WHERRY. I do. I am offering the printed amendment, which I did not offer yesterday, as modified, to comply with the request made by the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, eliminating the words "Administrator of said act" and inserting in lieu thereof "Secretary of Labor (or any Federal official utilized by him to assist in the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act)." The Secretary of Labor is the individual who administers the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In order to put the question clearly before the Senate, the Chair believes that the clerk should read the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, as proposed to be modified.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 20, beginning in line 20, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including line 18 on page 21, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

> (d) Neither liability nor punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of this act, nor liability for an additional amount as liquidated damages under section 16 (b) of this act, shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, prior to, on, or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling of the Administrator in writing, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling, after such act or omission, is amended or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect.
> (2) No liability for an additional amount as liquidated or other damages under the Walsh-Healey Act shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, prior to, on, or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling of the Secretary of Labor (or any Federal official utilized by him to assist in the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act) in writing, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling, after such act or omission, is amended or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY].

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I have no particular objection to the amendment, although it seems to me that when the wording "Secretary of Labor—or any Federal official utilized by him to assist in the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act" is used the objection which I made yesterday becomes valid. This amendment would include a subordinate far down the line who may make a ruling of some kind. The citizen who relies on the good faith of the particular subordinate may later find that he has been overruled by the Secretary of Labor. It seems to me that in order to make the amendment clear and certain, it should apply only to a ruling or a regulation issued by the Secretary of Labor or the Administrator of the Fair Labor Standards Act. If reliance is placed upon a regulation or order issued by him, there can be no question about it.

What I fear is a return to the situation which I discussed yesterday in connection with the term "practice." What is a practice? What kind of a practice could one rely upon in good faith, without running into confusion and litigation?

It seems to me that the provision should apply to some one high in authority, and not to a subordinate, who, while he may have no authority to make a regulation, yet if he makes one and a person affected relies upon it in good faith; that is all there is to it. There will be all kinds of rules and regulations made by subordinates of the Secretary of Labor. If any individual relies upon such rules and regulations, there is nothing the Secretary of Labor can do about it.

Mr. WHERRY. I appreciate very much the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I invite the attention of the Senator to the language of the committee amendment, beginning at line 21 on page 22:

> nor liability for an additional amount as liquidated damages under section 16 (b) of this act, shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, on or after the date of the enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice of the Administrator.

In the amendment which I offer I eliminate the word "Administrator", and the words "or practice", which the distinguished Senator called to the attention of the subcommittee. In the so-called Wherry amendment, which has been accepted by the committee, the words "or practice" and the word "Administrator" are eliminated, which very definitely meets the requirement of the distinguished Senator, in order to comply with the statute, because there is no Administrator of the Walsh-Healey Act. We use the language of the act, which designates the head of the agency to administer the act. I hope the Senator will not object to the amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. If the Senator from Nebraska wishes to have this language in the bill, I shall make no objection to it. However, in my opinion it will lead to confusion and chaos if we say "Secretary of Labor—or any Federal official utilized by him to assist in the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act."

Mr. WHERRY. The following words are "in writing." Also we eliminate the words "or practice."

Mr. LUCAS. The language is "Secretary of Labor—or any Federal official utilized by him to assist in the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act." If anyone in the field who has been designated by the Secretary of Labor to assist in the administration of the act makes a regulation or rule in writing, and the Senator's friend relies upon it in good faith, that is all there is to it. It occurs to me, as I stated yesterday, that no one but the Secretary of Labor or the Administrator of the Fair Labor Standards Act should make such regulations. Then if an individual were to rely in good faith upon a rule or regulation made by that individual, there could be no question about it.

Mr. WHERRY. I appreciate the Senator's argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY].

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. THYE. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question, in order that I may have a clear understanding of the situation with which we in Minnesota are confronted. At the present time claims are pending against the Northwest Airlines for services of employees of that company during the war era. The claims which are now pending are for 8 hours' pay per week, for the reason that at the time they were employed they were on a 48-hour-week basis and were not allowed time and a half for the extra 8 hours. I make this inquiry of the Senator for the specific purpose of assuring myself and the employees that they will not be disqualified in connection with the claims which they now have against the Northwest Airlines.

Mr. WHERRY. In answer to the question of the distinguished Senator, he is referring, as I understand, to section 16, subsections (a) and (b). I would say that the employees are not in any way injured in the rights which they already have. If the employer shows good faith the court could not impose any criminal penalty or assess liquidated damages. The employees could still receive their minimum wage and retain whatever rights they may have in connection with time and a half, but if this amendment were adopted they would be denied any relief so far as criminal findings for liquidated damages are concerned.

Mr. THYE. The reason we are definitely interested is that at the bombsight modification plant the workers were told that they had to complete a 48-hour week without time-and-a-half pay.

Mr. WHERRY. They would be paid for the extra time under the provisions of this amendment, but if the employer showed good faith they would be denied a criminal penalty or liquidated damages for an alleged violation.

Of course this does not meet the demand, as I see it, of thousands of small businessmen throughout the country who acted in good faith. I cited the case yesterday of a job printer in my State who was declared to be in interstate commerce because he used ink which he received from a firm in St. Louis to print letterheads. That man, who had been operating for years under the theory that he was engaged in intrastate business, found his business classified as interstate business. He acted in good faith upon an order. Certainly there is no criminal liability, and there should certainly not be liquidated damages. If it is found that the employees are entitled to a minimum wage they should be denied liquidated damages unless they can show that the employer acted in bad faith.

That is all that this amendment covers. It is a good-faith reliance clause. I think every Member of the Senate believes that one who acted in good faith on an order which was interpreted in writing by an administrator should be able to rely upon it; and if a supplemental order changed it, or if a judicial decision changed it, the most that should be done should be to have the employer comply with the minimum-wage law and pay the employees the time and a half to which they are entitled. But an additional penalty under the criminal law should not be imposed, and liquidated damages should not be assessed if he acted in good faith.

That is all there is to this amendment. I think it is a good one. I think the subcommittee should go even further than they have.

There were 78,000 orders issued since 1936. More than 73,000 pages were required to print them. They comprised more than 93,000,000 words. How could any businessman interpret those orders? He could not even analyze them, let alone interpret them. If businessmen relied upon the interpretation given in writing, by the Administrator, it is my opinion that they should be relieved of all liability. But I have agreed to go along with the subcommittee as far as it will go, and to perfect this amendment in this respect, so that employers may be relieved from liability under section 16 (b), which is self-explanatory.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question. Does the Senator from Minnesota know whether or not the Northwest Airlines transactions to which he referred are of the nature described in the Walsh-Healey Act, namely, the manufacture or furnishing of materials, supplies, or equipment in an amount exceeding $10,000?

Mr. THYE. I cannot answer that question, but I would say that it has already been recognized by the courts that the employees have a claim, and my concern is that they be not delayed by this amendment.

Let me read a paragraph from a statement relating to this question:

At several times during the period from 1942 to 1945, the Northwest Airlines admitted that it was in the operation of this center subject to the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and required to pay time and a half for overtime. It notified its employees to that effect. It changed its position, however, after an erroneous ruling by Mr. Leiserson, chairman of the railway labor panel. This was not a ruling by the panel, but by Mr. Leiserson personally, as I understand. Copy of Judge Nordbye's decision, which will be sent to you by others, shows that there was no basis in law for Mr. Leiserson's opinion.

That was the basic manner in which Northwest Airlines found itself in error by having allowed only straight time for a 48-hour week. Of course the workers have a definite claim, because they were supposed to have operated under a 40-hour week with time-and-a-half pay for the additional 8 hours.

I wish to make certain that no amendment will be adopted by the Senate which will deprive workers of legitimate claims.

Mr. DONNELL. This illustrates the difficulty of passing upon some of these cases without full and complete knowledge of all the facts. The distinguished Senator from Minnesota spoke to me about this situation several days ago, and I am sure that he gave me fully what he understood to be the facts. This is not intended in the slightest as criticism of him. However, I had derived the impression that the action taken by the Northwest Airlines was in reliance upon a ruling of the Administrator under the Fair Labor Standards Act. I do not think, however, that the Senator from Minnesota so stated to me; I think drawing that conclusion was my own error.

The reason I asked the question as to whether or not the transactions of this corporation came under the category which I read a few moments ago in the Walsh-Healey Act is that in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, the only situation in which an employer who is working under the Walsh-Healey Act may take advantage of this good-faith provision is in the event he has relied upon a ruling of the Secretary of Labor or any Federal official utilized by the Secretary of Labor to assist in the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act. In other words, if the Northwest Airlines relied upon the action of Mr. Leiserson, who, as I understand, was Chairman of the Railway Labor Board, I do not presently see how the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska would in any sense affect the Northwest Airlines, although earlier today I was under the impression that the Northwest Airlines had relied upon the action of the administrator under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and I stated both to the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Nebraska that in my opinion the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska would permit the Northwest Airlines to escape liability for liquidated damages.

Mr. President, I may say that as I now understand the effect of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska, in which personally and as chairman of the subcommittee I concur, although I cannot act for the Committee on the Judiciary, I believe that under that amendment, if an employer acted in good faith or in reliance upon any order, regulation, ruling, or interpretation in writing of the administrator under the Fair Labor Standards Act, such employer would not be liable for either criminal liability or liquidated damages; but under the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska he could not escape liability for overtime pay.

Let me illustrate that in this way: Suppose a company employed a man at the rate of $1 an hour, and suppose he worked for 50 hours of overtime; let us also suppose that the employer, relying upon a ruling of the administrator, did not realize that the man came under the act at all; the effect of the amendment would be that if the employer in good faith relied upon the ruling of the administrator, he would continue to be liable for time-and-a-half pay for overtime, but would not be liable for either criminal liability or for another $1.50 an hour, or time and a half, as the case might be, for liquidated damages.

Under the Walsh-Healey Act the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska would have the same effect, save only that the official who is specified there in lieu of the Administrator under the Fair Labor Standards Act is the Secretary of Labor or the Federal official utilized by the latter, as indicated in the amendment.

Let me state my understanding of the effect of the amendment. The most that the employees of the Northwest Airlines would have inflicted upon them by the adoption of the Wherry amendment would be as follows: If the employer relied upon the ruling of the Fair Labor Standards Administrator or, if he was under the Walsh-Healey Act, he relied upon the ruling of the Secretary of Labor or the official delegated by him, the employees would lose the liquidated damages, but would still be entitled to overtime or time and a half. In addition to that, Mr. President, as the Wherry amendment is now drawn, I do not think, presently, that the employees would in any sense be affected adversely at all by any ruling which had been made by the Chairman of the Railway Labor Board—namely, the office which I understand Mr. Leiserson held—because he was neither the Fair Labor Standards Administrator nor Secretary of Labor nor the official delegated by the Secretary of Labor under the Walsh-Healey Act.

Does that answer the question of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, no doubt the Senator has answered it as well as it can be answered. But I repeat that the point with which I am concerned is that no legislation be enacted which would disqualify employees who have a just claim. All I seek is the assurance that that shall not occur.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I wish the Senator to be perfectly clear in regard to my position in the matter. I am saying that if the Northwest Airlines, the employer, relied upon a ruling of the Fair Labor Standards Administrator in good faith, in that sense the employee does lose the right to liquidated damages. If the employee was employed to do 8 hours of regular work and if, in addition, he did 8 hours of overtime work, he would be entitled to time and a half for the overtime, under the Fair Labor Standards Act, or to overtime pay, for the 8 hours of overtime which he had worked.

Under the terms of the Wherry amendment such an employee could not collect, in addition to the $1.50 an hour for overtime, another $1.50 for liquidated damages, if the employer in good faith acted in accordance with and relying upon the ruling of the Administrator under the Fair Labor Standards Act. In other words, the maximum bad effect as against the employee would be that he would lose the liquidated damages—the extra time and a half—but he would not lose his original right to time-and-a-half pay for overtime.

If the employer were not relying upon the action of the Fair Labor Standards Administrator or the action of the Secretary of Labor or the Federal official by him delegated, I do not see that the employee would lose even his right to liquidated damages, whatever it might be. The right to receive liquidated damages, however, under the Walsh-Healey Act is a very limited liability, and applies in only a few cases.

If I may have the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH], who a few days ago stated in substance, as I recall, that the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act contain no provision for liquidated damages, let me say that I agree with him as to the Bacon-Davis Act, and I also agree with him that there is no tremendous liability for the liquidated damages under the Walsh-Healey Act, but I call attention to the fact that in the Walsh-Healey Act the following language appears:

> Any breach or violation of any of the representations and stipulations in any contract for the purposes set forth in section 35 of this title shall render the party responsible therefor liable to the United States of America for liquidated damages, in addition to damages for any other breach of such contract, the sum of $10 per day for each male person under 16 years of age, or each female person under 18 years of age, or each convict laborer knowingly employed in the performance of such contract, and a sum equal to the amount of any deductions, rebates, refunds, or underpayment of wages due to any employee engaged in the performance of such contract.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President——

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield first to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, I wish to say, first, in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska and the question asked by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, that if I correctly understand the situation, no workman will lose any of his regular rights, as a result of the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. If the workman was entitled to time and a half or any other benefits, he still would be entitled to them. I think that is what the Senator from Minnesota is interested in protecting.

Mr. THYE. Yes; that is exactly what I wish to protect; namely, the right of the employees referred to to obtain what they would otherwise have.

Mr. HAWKES. I understand that the Senator from Minnesota wishes to protect their right to what justly they would have been entitled to at the time.

Mr. THYE. That is correct. If they had recognized that the plant was operating under a 40-hour workweek, then if the men worked 48 hours, they would have been paid time and a half for the additional 8 hours. But as it was, they were recognized as being compelled to work 48 hours, and were compelled, therefore, to work for the full 48 hours at the regular-time rate. That is the basis of the claim these men have against the Northwest Air Lines. I took the floor to ascertain whether they would be disqualified in that respect, under this amendment.

Mr. HAWKES. Yes; I understand the Senator's point. I do not wish to delay the presentation of the Senator from Nebraska, because I know he is anxious to continue; but I desire to have him correct me if I am mistaken when I say that those men would have all the rights to regular pay and proper time and a half they were entitled to otherwise, before the amendment took effect but not to liquidated damages. Is not that correct?

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct. If they are in good faith they have those rights. If they are not in good faith, they are subject to all the penalties, and I think they should be.

Mr. HAWKES. Precisely. The Senator's amendment says that if a man acted in good faith under an administrative order——

Mr. WHERRY. Written order.

Mr. HAWKES. That man shall not be penalized or punished, if acting in good faith.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. I should like to keep the record straight at this point. In the discussion I had with the Senator from Missouri a few days ago we were speaking about the fact that no portal-to-portal case, so-called, has yet been brought under either the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act. I made the remark that the reason for this was that no amount was allowed under those acts to the employee as liquidated damages. The Senator from Missouri questioned the accuracy of that statement and now reads a provision from the general statute to the effect that there is a liability running to the United States by virtue of a violation of the Walsh-Healey Act. We were not talking about liability to the United States; we were talking about what an employee could recover for himself in a suit brought against his employer. So I think, Mr. President, that I was accurate in my statement the other day, and I am still accurate, that there is no reason whatsoever why any employee would consider bringing or be well advised to bring a suit for portal-to-portal activities under any act save the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. I believe that probably answers the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri in respect to that point.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator for his answer. I think the Senator will agree that the quotation I read is an accurate quotation from the Walsh-Healey Act.

Mr. McGRATH. I agree it is a correct quotation, but I agree also that it does not concern itself with what we were speaking about the other day, namely, what rights an employee has as against his employer for what we call liquidated damages. We include in the term "liquidated damages" two things, first, overtime pay to which an employee is entitled. We refer to that as "liquidated damages." We also include double time to which the employee is entitled, which I should rather refer to as a penalty. Perhaps what we should have said, for the sake of accuracy, was that, so far as the employee is concerned, there is no right to recover a penalty under either the Bacon-Davis Act or the Walsh-Healey Act.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield for one inquiry?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. May I inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island if it is not true that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the liquidated damages provided for in secion 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act are not a penalty?

Mr. McGRATH. The Senator is correct. The Court has taken them out of the category of a penalty, but they are in the nature of something other than wages, in my opinion, and I think they should be called by some other term than "liquidated damages."

Mr. DONNELL. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a further inquiry?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. The fact is, however, is it not, I inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island, that the language of the Fair Labor Standards Act is:

> Any employer who violates the provisions of section 6 or section 7 of this act shall be liable to the employee or employees affected in the amount of their unpaid minimum wages or the unpaid overtime compensation, as the case may be, and in an additional equal amount as liquidated damages.

That is a correct quotation from the act, is it not?

Mr. McGRATH. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McCARRAN. Just a moment. Reserving the right to object, does the Senator from Nebraska intend to hold the floor further?

Mr. WHERRY. No; as soon as my amendment is acted on I shall be glad to yield the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. I must apologize to the Senator; I have been absent from the Senate chamber. Am I to understand that he offered an amendment?

Mr. WHERRY. I discussed an amendment yesterday which I had had printed, and I asked that it lie on the table. It has to do with the good-faith clause we have been discussing. Yesterday at the end of the debate on the amendment, which extended nearly 2 hours, the chairman of the subcommittee suggested that the amendment would be accepted.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. AIKEN. Did I understand the Chair to say the amendment was agreed to?

Mr. WHERRY. I yielded to the Senator from Nevada for a question.

Mr. AIKEN. I am propounding a parliamentary inquiry to the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator propound his inquiry?

Mr. AIKEN. Did I understand the Chair to say that the amendment was agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair said that in the absence of objection the amendment was agreed to, and the Senator from Nevada objected, so the Senate is at that stage of the proceedings now.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator has a right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is still on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. McCARRAN. Do I understand now from the Senator from Nebraska that his proffered amendment was agreed to by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President——

Mr. WHERRY. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. In answer to the Senator from Nevada, I stated for the RECORD that, as chairman of the subcommittee, I did agree with the amendment, but I also stated that I had no authority to act on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary. I may add that, in my judgment, I would have no power so to do, and that the only way this amendment can be adopted is by vote of the Senate. So far as I am concerned, both personally and as chairman of the subcommittee, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then it may be understood that the amendment is before the Senate, and will be presented for a vote of the Senate later?

Mr. WHERRY. Let me continue, Mr. President. This morning I suggested a modification of the printed amendment, to perfect it so as to accord with the language suggested by the chairman of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee. Then I offered the amendment, and moved its adoption. For a couple of hours we have been discussing the amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. My only reason for raising the question now is not to take up time of the Senate, but rather to clarify the situation. Personally I could not join in a unanimous consent agreement that the amendment be adopted. If I stood silently by and agreed to that status, as I understand, it would be adopted, unless there were objection. For that reason I must at this time object.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment, and I will tell why I make the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. As the Chair understands, in the face of an objection from the Senator from Nevada, the Senate must vote upon the amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER proceeded to put the question.

Mr. McCARRAN and Mr. MORSE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield the floor?

Mr. WHERRY. If the distinguished Senator from Nevada wishes to discuss the amendment, I shall be glad to yield the floor, because I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I rise to propound a parliamentary inquiry. Can a Senator yield the floor for the purpose of having something else taken up when the Chair has called for a vote on the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that a Senator cannot yield to another Senator in the face of objection.

Mr. WHERRY. I object until we have a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. What is the Senator objecting to? He yielded the floor. He gave up the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I have a right to object to a unanimous-consent agreement to take up any other measure until my amendment is voted on.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada desire to debate the amendment?

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to debate the whole question. The entire subject is open to debate, and I desire to debate it.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that if the Senator from Nebraska has yielded the floor, then the Senator from Nevada has the floor, but that he cannot yield, in the face of objection, to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. He can certainly yield for a question, can he not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; he can yield for a question.

CLAIMS UNDER THE SETTLEMENT OF MEXICAN CLAIMS ACT

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 27.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. He seems to be allergic to information. I was going to explain the joint resolution, but of course in the face of his objection, I may not do so. It would take but a moment.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

This is a joint resolution to permit a certain claim to be submitted—not paid, but submitted—to the American-Mexican Claims Commission. The Commission will terminate its activities on April 4, and if this joint resolution is not passed now, the claim referred to may as well be thrown into the wastebasket. It is not a resolution requiring payment; it is simply to allow the claimant to have a hearing before the American-Mexican Claims Commission.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, how much time has the American-Mexican Claims Commission had within which to adjudicate this claim?

Mr. CONNALLY. It did not have jurisdiction of this claim. This resolution is to confer jurisdiction. It is not the fault of the Commission that the claim has not been heard. The claimant probably slept on his rights by not presenting the claim earlier, but I have consulted the Claims Commission, and while they have no views as to the merits of the claim, they assure me that if the joint resolution is passed promptly they can consider the claim, and, if it is just, they will allow it; if it is unjust, they will reject it.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Further reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Texas, if this one instance is allowed, will it become a case of the camel getting his nose in under the tent, and thus open the door to a whole field of similar requests?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; the case comprehended by the provisions of the joint resolution is the only one in existence. It cannot become a precedent, because there are no other cases like it. I will explain it more at length, if desired, and if the Senator will yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Was the joint resolution unanimously reported by the committee?

Mr. CONNALLY. It was. The Committee on Foreign Relations unanimously reported it on yesterday.

There have been three or four Mexican Claims Commissions preceding the present one, none of which ever completed its work. Some years ago, when this claim was submitted to the former General Claims Commission, United States and Mexico, it was rejected on some technicality. The Government appealed, but before the appeal could be heard the Commission terminated its activities, so that the claimant has not had an opportunity heretofore properly to present its claim. I repeat, this is not a resolution requiring payment; it simply allows the claimant to go before the Commission. If the claim is without merit, it will be rejected.

The Commission will cease to function on the 4th of April; therefore in order to accomplish the purpose of the joint resolution, it must be passed promptly. It seems to me the claimant is entitled to its day in court; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Texas takes the floor to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution; is that correct?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 27) amending the Settlement of Mexican Claims Act of 1942 to provide for the consideration of any claim decided by the General Claims Commission in which the United States filed a petition for rehearing, was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Settlement of Mexican Claims Act of 1942, approved December 18, 1942, be amended by adding after section 3 (a), paragraph (6) thereof, the following paragraph:

"(7) Any claim decided by the General Claims Commission in which the United States filed a petition for rehearing."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I thank the Presiding Officer and the Members of the Senate for permitting me to interrupt the very interesting and delightful debate which has been going on.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] is absent by leave of the Senate because of illness in his family.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRICKER in the chair). Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY].

The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN].

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, let me say at the outset that I honestly do not believe that all Members of the majority on the Committee on the Judiciary understand completely what this bill will do. The bill was discussed by the committee at 8 or 10 different sessions, but each time the committee met a new and revised draft of the bill was presented as the subject for discussion. On the day when the bill was ordered reported another new draft was laid down, containing substantial changes, and the vote in the committee was a straight up-or-down vote on reporting that draft of the bill, without any opportunity for perfecting amendments in the committee.

Nevertheless, the bill was before the Judiciary Committee and its subcommittee for some 7 or 8 weeks, and I would naturally anticipate that members of the committee—at least those members who must accept responsibility for the language of the bill—will be inclined to defend that language. I earnestly hope, Mr. President, that they will not attempt to do so, at least with respect to the criticisms which I make here today, until they have studied my remarks and studied the language of the Senate committee bill, and consulted their consciences, and slept on the matter. The criticisms I intend to make are not captious criticisms; they are serious criticisms. I intend to weigh my words, and I hope, for the sake of the Members who may feel impelled to defend the committee bill, that they will not take issue with me until they have studied the matter carefully, lest they put themselves on record in a way they would not desire. I do not mean to imply, Mr. President, that I think I am infallible or that I think what I may say cannot under any circumstances be challenged. But let him who would challenge it study the matter at least over night, and then, if he thinks I am wrong, come before this body and say so. I shall be willing to let the record of what I say today, and the record of what he may say then, stand clear for the country to see and judge. But for today, Mr. President, I desire simply to state a portion of the case against the majority bill. I do not wish to enter into controversy or colloquy concerning it, and I shall greatly appreciate it if my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will permit me to finish without interruption.

The worst feature of this majority bill, Mr. President, is that it thoroughly emasculates the Fair Labor Standards Act, not only with respect to portal-to-portal claims, and not only with respect to all past claims, but also with respect to future claims. I shall have a good deal more to say, by way of expansion on that statement. But I want to serve notice now on my friends of the majority, that the bill amounts to a virtual repeal of substantial portions of the Fair Labor Standards Act; that, if the bill is enacted, the Fair Labor Standards Act will remain little more than an empty shell; and that if such a result is accomplished through the votes of the majority, the majority will have to answer for that result to the people of this country.

Let me make it clear, Mr. President, that I do not now charge that the majority has an intention to repeal or emasculate the Fair Labor Standards Act, or that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate has any such intention, or that any particular Member of the Senate has any such intention. What I do say is that this committee bill, now before us, will accomplish that result; and if the bill is passed, by the votes of the majority, the majority will have to take the responsibility.

I call the attention of the Senate to the language beginning on line 19 of page 11, as follows:

For the purposes of this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities (as defined in section 5); nor shall any provision of any such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any such portal-to-portal activities.

Similar language appears in part 3, entitled "future claims", beginning on line 23 of page 15: and again, with respect to the Walsh-Healey and the Bacon-Davis Act, beginning in line 18 on page 17.

Leaving aside for the moment the question of making this Portal-to-portal Act applicable to the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act—a theory with which I do not agree—let us consider for a moment the language I have just read. This language is the last of a number of redrafts of the paragraph.

One of the earlier drafts of the bill, while it was in committee the second time, contained the following language:

For the purposes of this section, neither the Fair Labor Standard Act of 1938 nor any judicial or administrative interpretation thereof shall be deemed to have constituted such a provision of any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee as made any such portal-to-portal activities compensable.

Some of us in the committee raised serious objections to that language, because the obvious effect of it would have been to invalidate even collective-bargaining contracts to the extent that they provided for compensation of any activities which might fall within the majority bill's very wide definition of portal-to-portal activities. The sponsors of the bill admitted this would be so and even, for a time, argued that it should be so; but the sense of the committee was otherwise, and it was agreed the language would be changed. It was changed, in a subsequent draft of the bill, to read as follows:

For the purposes of this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation shall have the effect of changing any provision of any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities which were not compensable under the provisions of such contract.

That language was brought back to the committee, and was tacitly approved by the committee.

Then, in the final draft which was submitted for committee action, the language was changed again to the form in which it now appears in the committee amendment.

I submit, Mr. President, that the language as we now find it in the committee bill is little, if any, better than the language originally disapproved by the committee; and there was no opportunity in the committee for any separate vote on the new language.

The effect of this language is to make it impossible for a group of employees to contract with their employer so as to make compensable any activities defined as "portal to portal," even by direct reference in the contract and within the clear contemplation of both parties to the contract.

At this point, Mr. President, let me point out that while the language in the bill is identical with respect to both existing claims and future claims, so far as this particular paragraph goes, the term "portal-to-portal activities" means one thing with respect to existing claims and means an entirely different thing with respect to future claims. With respect to existing claims, the term "portal-to-portal activities" means, under the definition in section 5, beginning at line 3, on page 14:

Those activities which section 2 hereof provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act.

Mr. President, what are "those activities," under that definition? They are—and I read, beginning on line 5 of page 11:

Any activities of an employee engaged in prior to the date of enactment of this act, except those activities which were compensable by either (1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer; or (2) a custom or practice in effect, at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee was employed, covering such activity, not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract, in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer.

We find, therefore, that the term "portal-to-portal activities" is actually defined in terms of itself. The paragraph beginning with line 19, on page 11 of the committee amendment, says, in effect, that no judicial or administrative interpretation shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable, and no provision of any such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof any such judicial or administrative interpretation, shall make compensable, any activities not made compensable by such contract or by a custom or practice covering such activity and not inconsistent with such contract. That is just legalistic double-talk. There is no way to nail it down; and when we are dealing with proposed legislation which vitally affects the rights of more than 20,000,000 workers in this country, we ought to nail down most carefully everything we do so that its effect cannot be misunderstood or misinterpreted.

I call attention now to the short paragraph beginning in line 4, page 12, which reads as follows:

Each claim based on any portal-to-portal activities is hereby declared to be and is null and void and unenforceable.

I do not know, Mr. President, what the precise intent of that language may be, or what interpretation might be given to it by a court. But I can well vision an interpretation under which this language would be held to bar any claim which had as a component any portal-to-portal activities. As the term "portal-to-portal activities" is used here, it means activities which were not made compensable by an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract or by a custom or practice in effect at the time of such activity covering such activity and not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract in effect at the time of such activity. Therefore, it is entirely possible that the language of the paragraph I have just read might be held to invalidate any claim based, in whole or in part, on any activity not specifically covered by contract.

I say this language might be held to have such an effect; and I should not be at all surprised to learn that the real framers of this bill intended that it should have such an effect. If they did not so intend, it would have been easy to provide for the invalidation of claims only to the extent that they were based on portal-to-portal activities. But that was not done; and the way is thereby left open for a court to rule that if a claim involves, in any way, any portal-to-portal activities, the whole claim is bad. When we consider that possible effect, in the light of the definition of portal-to-portal activity, we get a result which virtually wipes out the Fair Labor Standards Act with respect to any claim already accrued. In that connection, Mr. President, I do not believe the so-called saving clause, beginning in line 15 of page 12 of the committee amendment, cures the situation. This saving clause again repeats the term "portal-to-portal activities." Furthermore, there is serious question whether a claim which is null and void can be deemed to have been incurred. The terms used appear incompatible. Release implies a valid claim; extinguishment involves a valid claim; the incurring of liability involves a valid claim; but a claim which is null and void is not valid and never was valid, in legal contemplation. There is nothing to release, and nothing to extinguish.

I do not wish to address myself at any great length, Mr. President, to the original text of the House bill as it came to the Senate. But I make this contrast between the House language and the language of the Senate amendment: The draftsmanship of the House bill is very, very unlawyerlike—so unlawyerlike that I venture to say the legislative counsel of the House was not consulted in connection with the drafting of the House bill. On the other hand, the language of the Senate committee amendment is extremely legalistic; it evidences, throughout its text, the work of highly trained, extremely capable, and extremely legalistic lawyers. The language of the Senate committee amendment is, in fact, so meticulously drawn that I am confident that many of the things which would be accomplished by it were not comprehended by all members of the Committee on the Judiciary, and were not intended by all of the members of that committee who voted for the majority bill.

Look now at section 4 of the committee bill, beginning in line 22 on page 12. This section constitutes nothing more or less than common-law pleading—pleading in the alternative. A Senator who does not believe that section 2 of the proposed legislation is constitutional could not, in good conscience, vote for the bill. Inclusion of section 4 certainly raises the presumption that there are grave doubts as to the constitutionality of section 2. In my opinion, section 4 is wholly unnecessary, and sets an unwise legislative precedent. The enactment of legislation in the alternative is not good practice.

Section 4 sounds as if it had been written by a lawyer who wanted to put so much language into this measure that he was attempting, in effect, to try his case in Congress, so that he would never have to go to court.

Let me turn to another phase of the subject by reading from the last paragraph of page 45 of the committee report, which states:

> Section 4 of the bill is designed to take away certain remedies and preferential treatment accorded employees or their representatives by the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, and the Bacon-Davis Act with respect to portal-to-portal claims which accrued prior to the date of enactment of the bill, if any claim barred under section 2 of the bill remains, for any reason, valid and enforceable after such date of enactment.

That statement appears to support what we have been told, Mr. President, at various other times; namely, that the provisions of section 4 of the proposed committee substitute are to come into effect only if the provisions of section 2 are declared unconstitutional or otherwise are rendered invalid; and then they are to apply only to the claims which section 2 provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment. Mr. President, that simply is not the fact. Under the clear provisions of this committee bill, section 4 is applicable for all time in the future with regard to claims brought under the Fair Labor Standards Act. I call the attention of the Senate to the paragraph beginning in line 17, on page 19 of the committee bill. It reads as follows:

> Any such claim, if based on portal-to-portal activities as defined in section 5 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, and any suit thereon, shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947.

In construing that language, Mr. President, it is necessary first to determine what is meant by "such claim." Bear in mind that section 9 of the committee bill, in which that language appears, proposes to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 by adding a new subsection. The proposed new subsection begins with the words "every claim under this act." Those are the words to which the words "such claim," in line 17, refer. It cannot be contended that the words "such claim" apply to all the language of the paragraph numbered (1), beginning at the top of page 19, because the words "such claim" are used again in line 9, on page 19, and are modified by additional requirements different from the requirements in the paragraph numbered (1). The paragraph numbered (1) refers to claims "accruing prior to or on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947." The provisions of the paragraph numbered (2) refer to claims accruing "prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947." The words "such claim" in the paragraph numbered (3) refer to "every claim," under the Fair Labor Standards Act, for unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation, or liquidated damages, "if based on portal-to-portal activities as defined in section 5 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947."

Bear in mind that while the definition of portal-to-portal activities in part 3 of the committee bill, relating to future claims, is contained in that part, and is substantially different from the definition of portal-to-portal activities in part 2 of the committee bill, relating to past claims, part 4 of the bill which we are now considering also has a future effect. Yet, in the language of subparagraph numbered (3), on page 19, we have an adoption of the definition from part 2. Therefore, with respect to future claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act, this bill would provide two different standards of portal-to-portal activities: First, the standard written into part 3; and, second, the standard so broadly set forth in part 2. We must remember that under the definition of "portal-to-portal activities" in part 2, everything is a portal-to-portal activity except activities which were compensable by either an express provision of a contract or by a custom or practice in effect at the time of the activity and not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract concurrently in effect.

Speaking by way of parenthesis, Mr. President, I am not at all sure but what the language of the committee bill, in the paragraph beginning in line 12 of page 11, would operate to permit an employee to plead a custom or practice only where he also had a written or nonwritten contract covering the specific activity in question; but I do not wish to press that point at this time.

We have seen, Mr. President, that the language of the paragraph beginning in line 17 of page 19 grafts upon the Fair Labor Standards Act, with respect to future claims, the definition of portal-to-portal activities contained in part 2 of the committee bill, and, with respect to all claims falling within that definition—and remember that we are talking about future claims now—invokes all the provisions of section 4 of the committee bill. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that identical language appears in a paragraph beginning in line 12 of page 20, with respect to future claims under the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act.

The general effect of these provisions, Mr. President, is to say that in the future no employee shall have any protection under the Fair Labor Standards Act except with regard to activities specifically covered by contract or, in some cases, by a custom or practice, in effect at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee was employed. I call particular attention, Mr. President, to the language "at the establishment or other place where such employee was employed." That does not mean the general custom or practice in an industry, Mr. President. It does not mean a custom or practice generally accepted and sanctioned by usage. It means nothing more or less than a custom or practice put into effect by the employer at the particular establishment in question. Clearly, a custom or practice cannot be in effect "between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer" unless the employer has agreed to it. Even if a custom or practice has been in effect for years, under tacit agreement by the employer, if the employer at any time specifically disagrees to that custom or practice, it is no longer in effect between such employer and his employees or the agent or collective-bargaining representative of those employees. For the future, therefore, the language of the majority bill means simply that no employee has any rights under the Fair Labor Standards Act which his employer is not willing he should have. That, I submit to you, is almost as effective, in repealing the Fair Labor Standards Act, as would be a bill which repealed that act directly: and direct repeal would be a much more forthright approach.

Mr. President, the effect of enactment of this committee bill would be to remove virtually all protection under the Fair Labor Standards Act from all unorganized employees, and, with respect to organized employees, to put them on notice that they have no right under the Fair Labor Standards Act except such rights as they can protect by contract. With respect, therefore, to organized employees, the effect of the enactment of this committee bill would be to put them on notice that they must immediately secure, from their employers, contracts specifically covering all the rights they now enjoy under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and which are not now specifically protected by express provisions of their collective-bargaining contracts. The net result, I venture to predict, would be a wave of strikes in this country which would make any period of labor unrest we have ever seen look like an afternoon tea party for the members of a mutual admiration society.

Let me call your attention now to the language of section 10 of the committee bill. This section would add another subsection to the Fair Labor Standards Act. The language of that new subsection, starting in line 20 on page 20, begins as follows:

Neither liability nor punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of this act, nor liability for an additional amount as liquidated damages under section 16 (b) of this act, shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith.

And so forth. In a moment I shall discuss the question of "good faith." Let us find out, first, for what liability and punishment that language proposes relief. Section 16 (b) concerns only the statutory rights of employees, when an employer violates the provisions of sections 6 and 7 of the Fair Labor Standards Act, to recover unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation or liquidated damages. But section 16 (a) refers, more broadly, to willful violations of the provisions of section 15. What does section 15 cover? It covers the transportation or sale, in interstate commerce, of goods in the production of which any employee was employed in violation of section 6 or section 7, or in violation of any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14; it covers violation of any of the provisions of section 6 or section 7, or of any of the provisions of any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14; it covers the discharge of, or discrimination against, an employee because such employee has filed any complaint—I stress the words "any complaint"—or instituted or caused to be instituted any proceeding under or related to this act, or has testified or is about to testify in any such proceeding, or has served or is about to serve on an industry committee; it covers the violation of any of the provisions of section 12; it covers the violation of any of the provisions of section 11 (c); and it covers the making of any statement, report, or record filed or kept pursuant to the provisions of section 11 (c), or of any regulation or order thereunder, knowing such statement, report, or record to be false in any material respect.

Thus we see, Mr. President, that the liability and the punishment as to which relief is given in section 10 of the committee bill relate not merely to the provisions of section 16, but also, by reference, to the provisions of sections 11 (c), 12, and 14, and also to the protection of an employee against discharge or discrimination for asserting his rights under the Fair Labor Standards Act. What is section 11 (c)? It is the section requiring every employer to make, keep, and preserve records of the persons employed by him and of the wages, hours, and other conditions and practices of employment maintained by him, and to make reports therefrom to the Administrator. And what is section 12? Section 12 contains the child-labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. And what is section 14? Section 14 contains the provisions of the act concerning learners, apprentices, and handicapped workers. Do Senators think that all the members of the Committee on the Judiciary who voted to report out this proposed committee substitute intended that this language should apply to the child-labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, to the provisions protecting handicapped workers, to the provisions requiring an employer to keep records and make reports, and to the provisions protecting an employee against discharge or discrimination for seeking or exercising his rights under the proposed act? I sincerely hope not. Nevertheless, that is what the bill does.

Now let us consider, as a whole, the language of the proposed new subsection, which would be added to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 under the provisions of section 10 of the committee bill. The language in question is as follows:

Neither liability nor punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of this act, nor liability for an additional amount as liquidated damages under section 16 (b) of this act, shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice of the Administrator, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice, after such act or omission, is amended or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect.

Nowhere in the committee bill is there a definition of good faith. Therefore, the term is subject to be stretched, if the bill shall be enacted, just as far as the cleverest lawyer that can be hired by the richest corporation in the country can stretch it. I venture to say it could be argued successfully that an employer acted in good faith if what he did or omitted to do was according to his own best interpretation of the particular regulation or order or ruling or practice upon which he presumed to rely. The bill does not even say he has to have legal advice with regard to such an interpretation; but even if it should be held that he did have to seek legal advice, every lawyer in this body knows that a man who looks for it it can get whatever kind of legal advice he wants.

Now notice the words "In accordance with or in reliance on" in lines 3 and 4 on page 21, and in line 13 on the same page. It is one thing to act in good faith "in accordance" with a regulation; it is an entirely different thing to act in good faith "in reliance" on the same regulation. The use of both terms in the committee bill makes it clear that the committee intends to set up a defense if the act or omission was in good faith, whether or not it was in accordance with the regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice relied upon.

I find other faults in the language of the proposed new subsection, not the least of which is the fact that it is so excessively legalistic, and so obscurely drawn, that it seems almost to invite controversy as to its meaning. However, I shall not burden the Senate with further discussion of this language except to point out that the inclusion of the word "practice" in line 6 on page 21 certainly gives rise to the need for definition. If a "practice" of the Administrator is not to be deemed to include any regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling—and it must be deemed not to include any of them, since they are all separately set forth—then about all that remains to which the word "practice" can be assumed to apply is the fact that the Administrator has or has not acted with respect to a certain class of cases. It may be, therefore, that under this language an employer could contend that he was acting in good faith if what he did had been done by other employers who had not subsequently been brought to account by the Administrator. In other words, this language seems to say to an employer, "if the other fellows can get away with it, you can get away with it, too."

When it comes to applying the same language to the Walsh-Healey Act, as is done by the paragraph beginning in line 9 on page 21, an even more absurd result is attained. In order to make the language applicable to the Walsh-Healey Act, it was apparently found necessary to leave out the words "of the Administrator", so that the language reads:

No liability for an additional amount as liquidated or other damages under the Walsh-Healey Act shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any administrative regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice, after such act or omission, is amended or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect.

Numerous questions immediately arise. Is the word "administrative" at the end of line 13 on page 21 to be deemed to modify not only the word "regulation," but also the words "order, interpretation, ruling, or practice"? If not, then the word "practice" might mean the practice of any employer, or the practice in any industry, or the practice of a Government department. If the word "administrative" is meant to modify all five of the nouns which immediately follow it, then at least it would seem that an employer is entitled to rely on any administrative regulation or any administrative order or any administrative interpretation or any administrative ruling or any administrative practice whether or not such regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice was sanctioned by the authorities charged with the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act. There is nothing in this language that says anything different. If an employer could find an administrative regulation or an administrative interpretation or an administrative practice that suited his needs, whether or not under the Walsh-Healey Act or any other act, he could use it and rely on it, and thereby escape liability. Can it be that that was intended by the members of the Judiciary Committee who voted to report out this bill? I sincerely hope not.

Remember, the word "interpretation" does not mean simply interpretations of what the Fair Labor Standards Act means, or what the Walsh-Healey Act means; it includes also many other interpretations, such as, for example, the interpretation of what constitutes a retail business. Under the language of the committee bill, if a businessman could find an interpretation of the term "retail business" which suited his purposes, even though that interpretation were entirely different from the interpretation of "retail business" by the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Administration, he could rely upon it until such time as it might be amended or rescinded. Senators, that would be like telling a lawyer he could win his case if he could find one case in point which upheld his theory.

One of the biggest problems faced by employers today, Mr. President, with respect to their liability under the Fair Labor Standards Act, is a question which has nothing to do with portal-to-portal activities. It is a question which has to do with whether or not particular employers or classes of employers are exempted under the act. Section 7 (c) of the Fair Labor Standards Act reads as follows:

> In the case of an employer engaged in the first processing of milk, whey, skimmed milk, or cream into dairy products, or in the ginning and compressing of cotton, or in the processing of cottonseed, or in the processing of sugar beets, sugar-beet molasses, sugarcane, or maple sap, into sugar (but not refined sugar) or into sirup, the provisions of subsection (a) shall not apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged; and in the case of an employer engaged in the first processing of, or in canning or packing perishable or seasonal fresh fruits or vegetables, or in the first processing, within the area of production (as defined by the Administrator), of any agricultural or horticultural commodity during seasonal operations, or in handling, slaughtering, or dressing poultry or livestock, the provisions of subsection (a), during a period or periods of not more than 14 workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year, shall not apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged.

That language placed a duty upon the Administrator to issue a regulation defining "area of production."

Several such regulations were issued. The Wage and Hour Administrator issued a regulation on October 20, 1938, which can be found in the Twenty-ninth Code of Federal Regulations, Supplement 1938, section 536.2 (b). Another and succeeding regulation was issued June 17, 1939, and can be found in the Twenty-ninth Code of Federal Regulations, Supplement 1939, section 536.2 (a) and (d). A third and broader regulation, supervening the two earlier regulations, was issued October 23, 1940, effective as of October 1, 1940, being published in the Sixth Federal Register, page 5165. Thereafter, in the case of Addison v. Holly Hill Fruit Products, Inc. (322 U. S. 607, decided June 5, 1944, rehearing denied October 9, 1944), the Court invalidated these regulations, the first two by specific reference, the third, by direct implication.

The Court, in its decision in that case, pointed out that the effect of declaring the regulation invalid was to leave the act with no exemptions whatever, based on area of production; and the Court said, in effect, that this would be an inequitable result. Therefore, the Court indicated that the Administrator should prepare and issue a new regulation, in keeping with the Court's decision, and that such new regulation would be deemed to have retroactive effect, presumably to the date when the 1940 order became effective. The Administrator's new regulation was not issued until December 25, 1946. Thus there is a period of about 6 years, during which the status of exemptions, based on the definition of area of production, is extremely uncertain. If the theory of the Supreme Court is to be followed, the 1946 order must be deemed to have retroactive effect, either to the date of the original 1940 order or at least to the date of the Court decision in 1944. To the extent that the December 1946 order is not deemed retroactive to any part of the 6-year period, there were no exemptions under the act based on area of production. Since the 1946 regulation did not operate to exempt all employers who were exempted under the terms of the 1940 regulation, it is clear that whether or not the 1946 order is deemed retroactive, and to whatever extent, substantial numbers of employers will find themselves subject to liability under the Fair Labor Standards Act in spite of the fact that they may have done everything in their power to adhere to the only regulations which were in existence. In other words, with respect to such employers the very result which the Supreme Court indicated would be inequitable will have been attained.

This is certainly a situation which needs correction, Mr. President. The joke is that neither the House Bill, H. R. 2157, nor the proposed Senate substitute, takes care of curing this situation. It seems apparent, from reading the House language, that the House Judiciary Committee had knowledge of this situation and was attempting to cure it; but the House language fails to effect the cure.

In attempting to make the House bill broad enough to cover this situation, the House has written language which is in some respects even broader than the comparable language of the Senate bill, if that is possible, and which is therefore equally objectionable to anyone who wishes to preserve at least some shreds of the rights of labor under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

But the House language fails to cover the situation with respect to the 6-year period between the 1940 regulation defining area of production and the succeeding 1946 regulation—and the Senate bill language fails in precisely the same respect—by a notwithstanding clause. The House bill says actions against employers shall be barred notwithstanding that after such act or omission, such decision, administrative regulation, order, ruling, interpretation, approval, enforcement policy, or practice is modified, rescinded, or determined by judicial authority to be invalid or of no legal effect. The Senate bill uses the language "notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice, after such act or omission, is amended or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect."

Under the language quoted in either case, the relief afforded, such as it may be, would not apply to an employer who relied on the October 1940 regulation subsequent to June 5, 1944, the date when it became invalid under the decision of the Court in the Holly Hill case. Thus we find that both the House language and the Senate language, while going much too far in depriving workers of their rights under the Fair Labor Standards Act, nevertheless fail to give specific protection to a large group of employers who are, in all fairness, entitled to such protection.

Mr. President, there are many other questions which might be raised, and which undoubtedly will be raised and discussed on this floor, in connection with the proposed Senate committee amendment. Many of them are questions of policy, such as whether State statutes of limitation should be overridden by the new Federal statute of limitation herein proposed to be established; what the proposed statute of limitation should be, whether it is either necessary or desirable to make this legislation applicable to the Walsh-Healey Act and to the Bacon-Davis Act, whether it is desirable to add a preamble, and whether the preamble proposed is acceptable in language and form, and so on. I have attempted to limit myself today to the discussion of points which I feel go much deeper than such questions of policy or expediency. It has been my main purpose here today only to point out some of the ways in which the proposed legislation would operate to render the Fair Labor Standards Act completely ineffective.

Of course, Mr. President, if the bill becomes law, the Fair Labor Standards Act will still remain on the statute books; but it will be a hollow shell, impossible of effective administration, stripped in large measure of adequate protection for employees, and amounting to little more than an invitation to endless litigation. If there be those who would say that the operation here proposed is not, after all, so serious, let me remind them of the farmer who thought his watchdog's tail was too long. He took the dog out behind the barn to perform a crude amputation on the excess caudal appendage; but his hatchet slipped, and he amputated the dog's tail just back of the ears. The animal was not much good as a watchdog after that.

In all seriousness, Mr. President, I want to repeat the warning which I voiced at the outset of my remarks. If the Members of the majority, by their votes, enact this bill, whether or not amended, in such form as effectively to repeal or substantially emasculate the Fair Labor Standards Act, the majority will have to answer for that result to the American people.

While the Senator from Nevada realizes the perplexing problems which confront the country I certainly am not ready or willing nor could I in conscience vote for the bill in its present form.

I may say, Mr. President, that at a later hour, either tonight or tomorrow, I shall offer the substitute prepared by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] and myself. At that time we will discuss the substitute in detail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] as a substitute for certain language in the Senate committee bill.

Mr. McGRATH obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hawkes	Morse
Baldwin	Hayden	Murray
Ball	Hickenlooper	Myers
Brewster	Hill	O'Conor
Bricker	Hoey	O'Daniel

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY].

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, at the beginning of the part which I shall take in the discussion of the question now before the Senate, let me say that I have been working for the past month or more in close cooperation with the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary to which the question of portal-to-portal pay had been referred. I have attended most, if not all, the meetings held by the full committee while we have been wrestling with this problem.

I do not wish anyone to obtain the impression that I have any lack of appreciation for what I think has been a wonderful devotion to public duty on the part of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], who comprised the subcommittee which heard the testimony on this subject and then attempted to draft a bill to meet the situation as they saw it. I pay this meed of tribute to them because I know that many of my colleagues in the Senate have not had the opportunity closely to observe the difficult task which they were endeavoring to perform.

It is no wonder to me, as I am sure it is no wonder to any other Senator who has listened to the debate for several days, that it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to arrive at an equitable solution of this problem. The committee made nine different attempts to draft a bill to meet the situation, and each of the nine drafts was substantially different from the others.

I endeavored to cooperate in every way, and to be constructive in my suggestions, although very often I found myself at variance with the object which the committee was seeking to achieve. However, that in no way deterred me from offering such advice and assistance as I could, in the sincere hope that we might obtain from the committee a proposal which could be accepted by both parties, and by persons of all economic views, such as are represented here in the Senate.

Out of that experience I have come to the conclusion that our failure to agree lies basically in the fact that we were trying to cope in a legislative way with a problem which is purely administrative. We were trying to write, in a few sentences and a few paragraphs of a congressional act, a rule of conduct which would control the habits of approximately 500,000 employers and many million industrial workers, covering within the scope of their operations millions of varying types and degrees of employment practices. If the debate in this Chamber has shown nothing else, it should have demonstrated the utter fallacy of the Congress trying to do that kind of a job by legislative enactment. The writing of these rules belongs in the administrative bodies of the Government, where they can be handled and given the attention called for by individual situations.

We know that there is great reluctance upon the part of some Members of the Senate to give to the administrative agencies of government the power which they should have in order to make rules by which people may know what are their rights and be protected in them. I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that if the advice of the Director of the Fair Labor Standards Act and the wage-and-hour law had been heeded by the Congress several years ago we would not have before us today the problem of portal-to-portal claims, for no such problem ever could have arisen. He proposed to the Congress that he be given adequate rule-making powers which would be subject to the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act guaranteeing and securing to all our citizens the safeguards of our courts and every other safeguard we have been able to erect, and we would have written rules, subject to hearings, of course, and to proper appeals to the courts; and there would have been provided the necessary legislative authority, so that anyone who followed an administrative ruling made in accordance with the American judicial system would have been protected against the element of surprise with which the American businessman is now confronted as he wrestles with these so-called portal-to-portal suits.

That is why I am taking the position in this debate that if we cannot wisely and constitutionally legislate to correct our past mistakes in not giving such ample authority under our democratic system, it hardly seems to me that we are properly approaching the problems of the future by continuing to deny administrative authority, the granting of which, as I see it, is the only way in which we can cope adequately with the situation.

I believe, as I have already said, that the committee bill which is before the Senate will result in greater confusion in the courts within the first 6 months after it becomes law, if it ever does become law, than already exists as a result of the portal-to-portal suits which we seek to outlaw, because the language of the bill is so vague, indefinite, and ambiguous, and the legalistic terms which are used and interused and intertwined are so mixed up that the members of the committee themselves could not understand what they meant. The Members of this body have been trying for more than a week to receive an adequate explanation of the meaning of the bill, but I dare say not half a dozen Senators could stand up at this moment and explain what the committee bill really does.

The enactment of this bill would be an open invitation to the lower courts to declare the act unconstitutional because in its enactment we express our own doubt. If we, the Congress, cannot resolve the constitutionality of what we are doing, why should any judge assume the responsibility of saying that what we have attempted to do is constitutional?

These cases will remain in court until every one of the ambiguities goes to the highest court of the land and is settled. There is not merely one ambiguity; there are dozens of them, as the debate in the Senate has shown. So, instead of being relieved of portal-to-portal suits, instead of freeing the business interests of the United States from the liability which is on their books, we do nothing but restrain for the time being the further prosecution of the cases until the myriad of constitutional questions can be carried through the courts.

Why do I say that? Because the committee itself admits that under the language of the bill many inequities are possible. The committee itself admits that in trying to write an over-all rule for the conduct of American businesss involving the so-called workday and workweek we are probably ruling out the valid claims of many American workingmen so that they shall no longer have a forum in which they can press their claims regardless of how right they may be or how unjust or cruel may be the employer. By this bill we give excuse for and forgiveness of the sins of the many employers who have abused their workers, and we place a premium on that kind of action at the expense of the vast majority of American employers who have been loyal and fair in dealing with their workers.

Then we say that if we have not succeeded in slaying these cases by bringing them within the confines of the language with respect to a contract written or unwritten—what an unwritten contract means in this respect I find it hard to explain to myself—anything which cannot possibly be brought into this category is declared to be null and void.

I do not believe that under the Constitution of the United States the Congress has a right to declare a vested interest or property right in myself or any other American citizen to be null and void. I take it that that would be depriving me of my property without due process of law; and I cannot conceive that it will ever stand up as constitutional in the courts of the land.

When we are through doing that, in another paragraph or subparagraph we declare, in effect, that if we have failed to kill off these suits by making a rigid standard of contract or custom or practice in a particular establishment, if we have failed the second time to slay them by the use of the language "hereby null and void," then we propose for the first time, I think, in American jurisprudence to write into our laws terms and conditions so harsh that no man, no matter how righteous his contract or his right to recover may be, would dare to bring suit, for it would hardly be possible for him to prove his case in court. I submit, Mr. President, that such procedure to cure any evil is unfair and un-American and not in accordance with the best of American judicial and democratic processes.

A substitute amendment has been offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and myself. In that amendment we seek to handle the problem of portal-to-portal claims by taking away the statutory right that may exist, or any right that may arise by statute for claims that have heretofore accrued. I do not say to the Members of the Senate that I do not entertain some slight doubt as to the constitutionality even of that approach, but at least I am going to say that if that approach is to be questioned it can be questioned on one simple point alone, which can be quickly resolved, and American employers who are affected by it can within the reasonably foreseeable future know where they stand and can close their books upon these matters, or they can make whatever settlement the Supreme Court of the United States shall indicate they ought to make.

My firm and fundamental belief is that we are making much ado about nothing; that these portal-to-portal suits, if left in the hands of the court now, as the picture stands as of tonight, would be adequately settled. I believe that well over 90 percent of the claims presented come within the decision of Judge Picard in the pottery case. I do not know what the Supreme Court will do with that case. I am aware, however, that the Department of Justice, representing our Government, is interceding in the Supreme Court looking for a quick and early termination of the litigation and for an opinion by that Court. I have hope that the Supreme Court will sustain Judge Picard. If it does, the problem will have been largely solved. How will we look 6 months or a year from now before the American people and the American workers for having enacted a law which is such a misfit, if I may call it that, as that which the committee has offered?

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McGRATH. I am glad to yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. The Senator from Rhode Island is making a very able speech, and I hesitate to interrupt him. But I should like to have this information: Does the Senator's substitute apply to portal-to-portal claims which might arise in the future?

Mr. McGRATH. It does not.

Mr. EASTLAND. Then is it not correct to say that 6 months from now suits could lie against employers on the basis of services, arising after the passage of this bill, which would be the same as the services on which the present suits are based?

Mr. McGRATH. I believe that is correct.

Mr. EASTLAND. So 6 months from now we would be faced with a situation identical to the one which faces us at this time, would we not?

Mr. McGRATH. With that statement I do not agree.

Mr. EASTLAND. That is to say, unless they were compromised or otherwise settled?

Mr. McGRATH. They could be compromised or otherwise settled; but I am stating that in my opinion, which is the opinion of only one Senator, the decisions of the courts, if the courts are left alone, will handle this problem much better than the Congress can handle it; and I believe that 6 months from now we shall have the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case, and we shall know much better where we stand. If the opinion of the Supreme Court bears out the opinion of the lower court, these cases will have vanished into thin air.

Mr. EASTLAND. Of course we do not know what the Supreme Court will decide. Today the Supreme Court of Georgia made a decision which took many persons by surprise. But if the decision of the United States Supreme Court affirms the decision of the lower court in the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case, 6 months from now such suits would lie just as they do today; would they not?

Mr. McGRATH. I do not think we should engage in the practice of trying to beat the courts of the United States to decisions in matters so imporant as is this one. I should prefer to see the case through to an end in the courts, and then have any legislation which Congress enacts based on the findings of the courts.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Rhode Island is sincere in that respect; but I should like to have him answer this question: Six months from now would suits lie for services identical to those for which the present suits have been filed?

Mr. McGRATH. I think some might.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. In respect to the question regarding what might be the situation 6 months from now, is it not true that at that time we would have the benefit of any court decisions which might be rendered between now and then, and also there would be the probability, now that this matter has become ambiguous, that in most cases it would be settled by an express agreement between the employers and employees in the various industries which might be affected?

Mr. McGRATH. Not only that, but if the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and myself were adopted, it would be the clearest and the simplest declaration of legislative intent that it is possible to have on this subject; and I do not hesitate to say that with that legislative intent written into the record, no more claims of this type or nature would ever be brought in the United States.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I understood the Senator from Rhode Island to state that in his opinion 90 percent of the suits would prove to be settled on the de minimis theory. Is my understanding in that respect correct?

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, there is little more than the de minimis theory to the litigation in the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case, for, as I understand that case, the mandate of the Supreme Court was that the lower court should take into account the de minimis theory, but should also apply, in connection with the application of the de minimis theory, its views, if I may call them that, upon the realities of our industrial life. Now, the opinion of the lower court is based, not alone on what we have heretofore understood to be the de minimis theory, but also in accordance with the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States, upon the realities of our industrial life. Any cases which are brought hereafter to recover damages in actions of this type will certainly have to be cases which meet the test of what are the realities of our present-day industrial life.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island further yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I understood the Senator to say that in his opinion the situation now confronting us is "much ado about nothing," and that in the course of time some 90 percent of the litigation will be settled by virtue of the doctrine set forth by Judge Picard in his recent decision. I ask the Senator whether he personally has examined the court files in any one of the 1,913 cases which have been filed in the Federal courts of the United States up to and including January 31 of this year.

Mr. McGRATH. I have followed closely the Picard decision and the newspaper accounts, which rather accurately interpret for us the basis on which many of those suits have been brought. I am also aware of the practical situation involved; namely, that these suits are largely representative suits, representative of thousands or perhaps millions of Americans who do not even know they are represented in those suits. So, although the amount of money involved appears to be large, when we speak in terms of $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000, yet in fact, the number of litigants who personally have authorized the bringing of these cases is not large.

I have not examined minutely the facts in the complaints or declarations of many of the other cases, or, I may say, any of the other cases that have been filed. But if we are correct in assuming to legislate on this subject, then, indeed, the Senator from Missouri must himself agree with me that the justification for the other suits which are represented in this vast amount of litigation must to a very considerable extent be trivial indeed.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. The question I asked has not yet been answered. I asked whether the Senator from Rhode Island has examined the court files in a single one of the 1,913 cases which have been filed between July 1, 1946, and January 31, 1947.

Mr. McGRATH. I have had no purpose to examine them, and I have not done so.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator has not examined them?

Mr. McGRATH. No, sir.

Mr. DONNELL. Would it not be necessary, in order to know the merits of the cases, at least to know from personal knowledge what the plaintiffs in the cases allege in their pleadings?

Mr. McGRATH. I can apply a little bit of reason and common sense to the answer, Mr. President, and I say that all those cases were brought after an opinion of the Supreme Court which let in a case which now turns out to be a trivial one. Therefore, I conclude that the great majority of those cases had not been brought earlier because they contained in themselves no more merit than the case upon which the Supreme Court has passed, and which the lower court now has said has very little or no merit; and I expect that the Supreme Court of the United States likewise will uphold that decision of the lower court.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me once more, to permit me to ask a question?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. Do I correctly understand that the Senator from Rhode Island is basing his statement that the situation now before us is "much ado about nothing" and that 90 percent of the litigation will be disposed of as he has indicated, upon his reasoning, rather than upon an exact or, in fact, any examination of the facts in the specific cases before the courts?

Mr. McGRATH. That is correct. I will change my statement of "much ado about nothing," and will make it "much ado about little."

Mr. President, such part of the debate as I have engaged in up to now has dealt with bringing into the situation certain acts of Congress protecting American labor, which I have felt had no part whatsoever in the matter which was before the Judiciary Committee, and have no place in legislation affecting portal-to-portal issues. It was within only 1 or 2 days of the last day that our committee was considering this matter that it was decided to throw in, somewhat for good measure, it seems to me, the Bacon-Davis Act and the Walsh-Healey Act. We knew not too much at that time about the history of these acts, or how they were affected, but we have since discovered. We have since concluded that not one of the 1,900 cases to which the distinguished Senator from Missouri has alluded in any way involves either of these two acts, which have been working splendidly on our statute books, to the satisfaction of the Government, employer, contractor, and worker alike. There has been no demand that there be legislative interference at this time with these two acts. So one can only conclude that in our haste to damage the labor laws of the country the Bacon-Davis Act and the Walsh-Healey Act have been dragged in.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I did not want to interrupt the Senator, but I have been puzzled about these two acts, and why they were included in the particular measure which is now before the Senate. I have wondered if the committee heard any testimony at all in its public hearings involving the two acts.

Mr. McGRATH. Not one word. They were never considered by the committee in hearings, and, as I stated, the committee as a whole did not know that they were to be included in the final draft until within a matter of a few days of the time the draft was reported to the Senate.

I should like to say, for the purposes of the record, something about the history of this legislation. Until 1931 there was no Federal statute applying the prevailing-rate-of-wage principle to Government construction contracts, although legislation of this character had been in effect in several States for a number of years. It was not until 1930 that the impact of the depression began to make its effect felt upon the building-trades industry. I wish to say at this point that I do not think the building-trades industry and other great labor organizations which have been the recipients of the benefits of the Bacon-Davis Act or the Walsh-Healey Act realize yet what would be done to those acts by their incorporation in the proposed law.

In 1930 the impact of the depression began to make itself felt, and felt very strongly, in the building industry, with the result that the Department of Labor received numerous complaints that contractors were taking advantage of the unemployment situation to cut wages below the scales which had theretofore prevailed, that they were engaging in the practice of transporting cheap labor to jobs, to the detriment of local union standards.

This was particularly true of Government contracts, where competitive bidding had to be in effect. Realizing the pressing need for legislation on this point, Senator Davis and Representative Bacon, in the Hoover administration, introduced a bill, which was enacted into law on March 3, 1931. Under this statute contractors on public buildings were required to agree to pay no less than the prevailing rate of wages for work of a similar nature in the municipality or other civil subdivision of the State. In the event of a dispute which the contracting officer could not adjust, the matter had to be referred to the Secretary of Labor for his determination.

The result of a long felt need for protection of local wage levels from the disturbing effects of the importation of laborers and mechanics by outside contractors, this statute, as I have said, was the first Federal statute embodying the prevailing-rate-of-wage principle. Its effect was substantial, but it failed to anticipate certain types of evasion by unscrupulous employers and establishments who were following standards still condemned by the principle of the statute.

The Senate Committee on Education and Labor, in the Seventy-third Congress, had this to say:

> The enactment of this law stabilized labor conditions on Government building construction almost immediately, by removing one of the most serious causes of labor disputes. * * * There were, however, wage-cutting contractors in different parts of the country who sought to circumvent the new statute. One of the most popular methods of defeating the law was to pay the prevailing rate but to exact refunds (kick-backs). Other contractors evaded the law by posting scales which conformed to the legal standard, and paying lower rates. Others would pay the legal rate but make exorbitant rates for rentals, or supposed advances. Then there were numerous contractors who took advantage of variances in wage rates in the communities where the contract was being performed by paying the lowest of the local rates until the contracting officer was compelled to refer the matter to the Secretary of Labor for determination.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KILGORE. Would there not be, under the act, the possibility of, shall we say, cutting or lowering the wage scale by reason of preliminary and postliminary work not a part of the job, such as carrying materials, sharpening tools, and various other activities beginning just before the whistle, and requiring the worker, by so doing, really to lower his scale, although his scale would meet apparently the requirements?

Mr. McGRATH. That is a point I was coming to, and I shall state it now, but perhaps it will be repeated later in my remarks.

There is now an attempt to break down the standards which the Bacon-Davis law and the Walsh-Healey law sought to set up by contract, agreement, custom, or practice entered into agreeable to the workers and the employer, forgetting entirely about the general public interest, which is the background of all these statutes. The philosophy behind them is not the philosophy that you and I, Mr. President, as contractor and worker, have a right to contract, but that we have no right to import into the contract terms that which would hurt the general public interest.

It seems to me the bill proposed by the committee opens up these questions hereafter, to negotiation, collective bargaining, written contract, nonwritten contract, or custom or practice which is not general in the industry or to the locality which is local but which is confined to a particular plant or particular employer, and that, I think, is very objectionable.

Mr. KILGORE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Some question has arisen in my mind, and in the minds of other Senators, whether or not under the terms of the committee bill an employer would have a right to enter into a contract with an employee who came under either of the acts mentioned, for a wage scale less than that now provided for in the Fair Labor Standards Act. I desire to know whether or not I am correct in my understanding of that particular policy.

Mr. McGRATH. I fear that an interpretation can be placed on the committee bill which would allow, by private contract, the setting up, as between an employer and his individual employees, of standards which probably are less than the standards required by the Walsh-Healey Act or the Davis-Bacon Act. That is my opinion.

Mr. LUCAS. May I ask if that is also the Senator's opinion with respect to the Fair Labor Standards Act?

Mr. McGRATH. I think the opportunity for evasion in the Fair Labor Standards Act comes not so much in the matter of the minimum wage as it does in determining the amount of time that shall be put in, in order to secure the minimum wage. The opportunity for chiseling, there, is an opportunity to chisel upon the hours worked, by counting so many things as preliminary and postliminary, make-ready, riding time, and so forth.

Mr. LUCAS. But the Senator is of the opinion that under the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act an employer could enter into a contract with employees for a wage which is less than that required under the statutes which were enacted at that time for the benefit of the employees?

Mr. McGRATH. I do not say so positively, but I think the committee's bill reasonably lends itself to that interpretation.

Mr. LUCAS. I am not sure, from my listening to the arguments and the debates on portal-to-portal pay, that any Senator is certain of anything so far as the constitutionality of the proposed act is concerned, or so far as what it may or may not do. In other words, from my reading of the bill as reported by the committee and from what I have heard in these debates, I have reached the very definite conclusion that if pending portal-to-portal bill passes as it now stands, it will open the door to an interminable amount of litigation and chaos and confusion in the labor-management field.

Mr. McGRATH. I fully agree with that statement by the Senator.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Would the Senator read that portion of the bill which leads him to the conclusion that it would open up the field in the manner the Senator from Illinois has described?

Mr. McGRATH. I shall not read the particular portion; I shall refer the Senator to it, when I say that it is that portion, and all of that portion of the bill which attempts to deal with future claims.

Mr. President, the enforceability of the act of which I have been speaking, that is, the Davis-Bacon Act, was further circumscribed by a series of decisions of the Comptroller General in the first 2 years of its life. As a result the Senate, by special resolution, authorized in 1934 a subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor to investigate wage conditions on Government construction. At the same session, Congress passed the Copeland Act, making the exaction of kick-backs a criminal offense. The subcommittee was subsequently authorized to continue its studies, and on May 13 it issued its report containing an exhaustive analysis and a recommendation for the amelioration of the conditions it found.

That the violations of the Davis-Bacon Act were frequent and, within the limits of its terms, unpreventable, was the subcommittee's conclusion. It found several methods of evasion to be habitual, at least half of them being in the nature of rebates or deductions by contractors from the wages to which employees were by law entitled.

The following types of alleged violations were uncovered by the evidence:

1. Many instances of direct kick-backs where the employee returned a stated sum to the employer or a representative thereof upon the receipt of his weekly pay envelope.

2. Instances where underpayment was effected by including in the pay envelope less than the stipulated amount of wages for labor performed.

It is to be recalled that abuses of this precise character moved President Hoover, on February 9, 1932, to issue an Executive order interpreting the Davis-Bacon Act as follows:

It is expressly understood and agreed that the aforesaid wages shall be paid unconditionally in full not less often than once a week and in lawful money of the United States, to the full amount accrued to each individual at time of payment and without subsequent deduction or rebate on any account.

The failure of all of these measures, including the Copeland Act and regulations thereunder requiring affidavits from employers certifying that no rebates or deductions from wages due had been made, compelled the subcommittee to conclude that amendments were required adequately to implement the prevailing wage principle:

The investigation revealed the probability that many reputable contractors, whose desire it was to adhere strictly to the intent of this law, were deprived of Government contracts by unscrupulous contractors, who, recognizing that methods could be employed to evade the provisions of the law made their bids sufficiently low to obtain the business. It was with this type of contractor that the Government departments in many cases had to deal, and through lack of coordination between the various Government departments, and absence of definite and feasible means of enforcement under the law, they continued to deal.

Various methods were used by this type of contractor to deprive laborers and mechanics of the wage to which they were justly entitled. While the so-called kick-back was chief among these methods, other means were also resorted to and made possible by indefiniteness in the law and complications that arose in its administration. Other practices revealed by the testimony taken by the committee included exorbitant deductions for supposed advances for rent and food, forced loans with high interest rates, and refusals to comply with orders to pay the prevailing wage. The contracting agency under the provisions of the said Executive order could, of course, terminate the contract where this last-named abuse existed. However, to a large extent their reluctance in taking this action was prompted by the necessity for having the work accomplished at the earliest possible date and a desire to avoid the manifold complications attendant upon the termination and settlement of partially completed contracts.

Legislation is desirable which would cause the general contractor to be primarily responsible for making restitution to any workman on the project from whom refunds were exacted, regardless of whether the person who received the refund was the contractor himself, a subcontractor, or agent. Such an amendment would make enforcement easier by tending to compel the general contractor, for his own protection, to police the wage practices of the subcontractors."

Accordingly Senate Resolution 3303 was drafted, reported out of committee (79 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 11815) and after a minimum of debate passed by both Houses and signed by the President on August 30, 1935 (79 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 14691). The report of the full committee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, which summarized the findings of its subcommittee, has this to say of the prohibition of rebates and deductions in the amended statutes:

The burden of seeing to it that the illegal practices of exacting rebates or kick-backs is eliminated is placed upon contractors by the provision that each contract shall contain a stipulation requiring unconditional weekly payments without subsequent deductions or rebates.

Substantially the same explanation is made in the report of the House Committee on Labor (H. Rept. 1756, 74 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 12862).

From this review it is impossible not to recognize the integral relationship between the words of that portion of section 1 of the amended Davis-Bacon Act and the long history of business practices out of which the prevailing-wage principle was crystallized. The clause was designed to reach a kind of abuse with whose prevalence its draftsmen were intimate, and to prevent its continuance in any form. It was not enough to specify the varieties of the violations of which evidence was available; their number and ingenuity testified to the ineffectiveness of any but a broad and inclusive prohibition. Hence provision is made against rebates or deductions in the following language:

> Every contract based upon these specifications shall contain a stipulation that the contractor or his subcontractor shall pay all mechanics and laborers employed directly upon the site of the work, unconditionally and not less than once a week, and without subsequent deduction or rebate on any account, the full amounts accrued at time of payment, computed at wage rates not less than those stated in the advertised specifications, regardless of any contractual relationship which may be alleged to exist between the contractor and subcontractor and such laborers and mechanics.

I repeat, "regardless of any contractual relationship which may be alleged to exist between the contractor and subcontractor and such laborers and mechanics."

It seems to me that at this point we are pretty close to coming into conflict, if we do not actually do so, with the proposal now made by our committee that we include in the presently considered legislation an amendment to the Davis-Bacon Act.

It can be seen from the foregoing that the Davis-Bacon Act was designed to accomplish a twofold purpose:

First. To insure a fair wage to construction mechanics and laborers employed under Federal contracts, and Second. To protect the interests of the ethical contractor against underbidding and undercutting by the unethical contractor whose low bid is usually based upon depressed wage rates and working conditions for the building-trades workers.

It may be pointed out again, Mr. President, as it has been pointed out heretofore, that portal-to-portal questions have not been raised and have not become vexing problems in the great construction industry because this act which protects that industry has worked so well; and yet it is now proposed to tamper with it, to say the least. Contracts entered into between the building-trades unions and construction contractors usually specify the activities which are to be considered as included in working time. The working conditions established in union agreements have provided a pattern to be followed throughout the industry even by the nonunion employer. The fact that no suits based upon portal-to-portal claims have been brought by building-trades unions or unorganized construction workmen testifies to the stability in the industry with regard to these portal-to-portal questions. I think that in itself is testimony to the effective working of this law.

Mr. President, I feel that the Congress should cautiously approach any modification of the Davis-Bacon Act which might conceivably result in opening the door to the unethical practices which were prevalent at the time the act was brought into being in 1931, and perfected by subsequent amendments.

In this regard it should be noted that sections 4 (d) and (e) of H. R. 2157 provide that settlement, compromise, release, or satisfaction of claims based on portal-to-portal activities may be pleaded in defense of such claims. These provisions for compromise or release directly weaken the provision in section 1 of the Davis-Bacon Act that the contractor or his subcontractor shall pay all mechanics and laborers employed directly upon the site of the work unconditionally, and not less often than once a week, and without subsequent deduction or rebate on any account, the full amounts accrued at time of payment computed at wage rates not less than those stated in the contract specifications regardless of any contractual relationship which may be alleged to exist between the contractor or subcontractor and such laborers and mechanics. By permitting settlement, compromise, release, or satisfaction of wage claims under the Davis-Bacon Act, the strict requirements of section 1 of the act are greatly weakened and areas of evasion are created which may be used by unethical contractors to circumvent the general purposes for which the Davis-Bacon Act was enacted. A weakening of the strict provisions of the Davis-Bacon Act in this respect may encourage, and I dare say will encourage, unscrupulous contractors to resort to undercutting and chiseling devices based upon the probability that liability can be avoided by compromise, settlement, or release; that they can be freed from their wrongdoing.

This is precisely the evil at which the Bacon-Davis Act was aimed. While the organized union workers will undoubtedly have some measure of protection against such unethical devices, I ask Members of the Senate what will result for the unorganized workers. They will lose much of the protection which this law was designed to give them.

Section 9 of H. R. 2157 places a statute of limitations of 2 years on claims for unpaid minimum wages under the Davis-Bacon Act. This limitation may result in a hardship and inequities to construction workmen who have valid claims which are not related to portal-to-portal questions. It is my understanding that claims resulting from underpayments under the Davis-Bacon Act very frequently are not presented until more than 2 years have passed from the date that the rights of the workmen accrued. This is due to a number of reasons which in all fairness we ought to take into consideration.

First. The workman or workmen may not be aware of their rights under the Davis-Bacon Act or the minimum wage that the contract requires and may not discover that they have been underpaid or misclassified until the period of 2 years or more has elapsed.

Second. Workmen on construction projects may be reluctant—as we all know from human experience, and so we may take judicial notice of the fact—to present claims during the period of their employment and to go the extent of bringing lawsuits during the period of their employment which will jeopardize their continued rights to their employment, and this is particularly so in times of short employment. So such workmen have no recourse but to allow their claims to await until the completion of the particular construction project.

Third. If this proposed legislation is enacted we cannot close our eyes, Mr. President, to the administrative procedure which we have set up in another act, and expect the courts of the land to say that both are consistent and workable. The administrative procedures which are necessary to determine the validity of the workman's claim for back wages under the Davis-Bacon Act frequently take a considerable length of time which may very easily run for a period of more than 2 years. For example, when a workman presents a claim to the contracting agency, the agency must investigate all the conditions of the man's employment to determine the correctness of his claim. If the contracting agency determines in favor of the workman's claim and the contractor disputes the accuracy of such determination, the matter must be referred to the Secretary of Labor for final determination. It then becomes necessary for this Department to investigate all of the conditions of employment and general employment practices in the area and rule on the question. The Secretary's ruling is sent to the agency and the machinery necessary for getting the man paid is begun. This whole process, by its very nature, frequently takes several months, many months, and the statute of limitations may well run before the workman can institute action for recovery of the back wages if such action becomes necessary.

In this bill Congress may weaken an act under which, during the recent war, $50,000,000,000 worth of Federal war construction was carried out, with a minimum of labor strife, and out of which not a single portal-to-portal suit has arisen.

I repeat that statement, Mr. President. Fifty billion dollars' worth of work was satisfactorily handled under this law, and yet today we are considering tampering with it.

The Davis-Bacon Act contains no language upon which portal-to-portal claims may be based. The portal-to-portal question has not been a problem in the construction industry. The industry has worked out to its own complete satisfaction all problems relating to work which is to be computed as compensable time. The industry as a whole, both from the employers' side and the employees' side, enthusiastically supports the Davis-Bacon Act and the ends which it accomplishes. In the face of these facts it would seem most unwise for us to include in any bill we feel it necessary to pass in order to deal with this emergency proposition, language that will weaken an act which has proven itself so worthy.

Mr. President, although a great deal of testimony was heard by the committee, all of it dealt with the effect of portal-to-portal cases on the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. Not a single instance was cited of an employer being faced with a portal-pay claim under either the Walsh-Healey or Davis-Bacon Act. There was and is no testimony indicating that portal-pay claims under these acts may arise in the future. During the whole course of the hearings no administrative rulings under these acts were pointed to by anyone to show unfair operations of these acts. No judicial interpretation under these acts was even mentioned in the hearings. Yet this body is asked to amend these acts because they are working or may work hardships. I ask Senators, What hardships are referred to? They are not mentioned in the testimony before the committee. They are not mentioned in the committee's report on the bill. The report was written before the committee even thought of these two acts. They have not been mentioned on the Senate floor as being the cause of any difficulty. Where can we find out what are the nefarious practices under these acts we are asked to outlaw? Perhaps these practices are to be found in the proposed congressional declarations and findings in the bill. The last paragraph of section 1 of the bill on page 10 says:

> The Congress further finds and declares that all of the results which have arisen or may arise under the Fair Labor Standards Act * * * may arise with respect to the Walsh-Healey and Davis-Bacon Acts.

We make their working nefarious, because in the preamble to a measure we choose to say that they are.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOWLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I correct in my understanding that the bill which was originally reported by the Judiciary Committee dealt only with portal-to-portal claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act?

Mr. McGRATH. It not only dealt solely with portal-to-portal claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act, but, as I recall, it dealt only with past claims.

Mr. LUCAS. What caused all this excitement overnight about the Davis-Bacon Act and the Walsh-Healey Act, which the Senator is now so ably discussing?

Mr. McGRATH. Putting together the information which I have, I believe it grew out of the action by the House. For some reason yet unexplained, the House thought it was necessary to include those two acts in its bill, and the Senate committee simply accepted the suggestion and concluded that we should include them in our bill. There is no similarity between the bill reported by our committee and the bill which was passed by the House. This may have been an effort to resolve one point in advance, to prevent it from going to conference.

Mr. LUCAS. Is not that the real reason those acts are mentioned? Was it not to placate certain Members of the House of Representatives who were greatly disturbed over the fact that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate had not even considered their bill when it was before them? Is not that the real basis for including those acts?

Mr. McGRATH. I shall answer the Senator by saying that I believe that was the real reason, but also I believe that it was done without reason.

Mr. LUCAS. I think the answer is correct on both horns of the dilemma.

Mr. McGRATH. Let us look for a moment at the dire results which the committee, without hearing a single word of testimony, suggests that this Congress solemnly declare will occur under these acts.

The findings commence with the phrase "under judicial interpretations which require the payment of compensation for activities not previously regarded as work." What judicial interpretation of the Walsh-Healey Act is meant? What interpretation of the Davis-Bacon Act meets this description? The findings continue that such interpretations have created "wholly unexpected liabilities, immense in amount and retroactive in operation." What Senator knows of a single case of such a liability or a case of potential liability under these acts? The committee, with a greater clairvoyance than is generally expected of other Members who are mere mortals, then proposes that, if these unknown and nonexistent judicial interpretations are permitted to stand, the Congress make the prediction that—

First. The credit of many employers will be impaired. Since we do not know whether the judicial interpretations referred to impose "enormous liabilities" apparently nonexistent, this prediction must refer to the credit of mythical employers.

Second. The second prediction is that the payment of such liabilities would bring about the financial ruin of many employers. I assume that the committee means many mythical employers will be financially ruined by paying nonexistent liabilities owed to unknown persons.

Third. The third prediction is that employees will receive windfall payments for work for which they believed they were fully compensated.

This prediction points out the vacuum in which the committee operated when considering the Walsh-Healey and Davis-Bacon Acts. We are not told whether there were any claims, or will be any claims of any particular kind, yet we are asked to predict that unspecified types of claims—if there were any, are any now, or will be in the future—were, are, or will be windfalls to the employees. Of course, this overlooks the very real fact that any claim on which an employee collects back wages is a windfall to him in the sense that when the employer first refused to pay it, the employee probably never expected to get it. Is the committee referring here to all claims under these acts or specific claims, and if the latter, what claims are meant?

The findings further allege that the Treasury is being deprived of revenue, that champertous practice and congestion of the courts result, and that Nation-wide industrial conflicts and disputes are caused. The last one is really the prize, namely, that under these acts gross inequality of competitive conditions occur. Just what inequality may occur is not mentioned by the committee anywhere. Then the findings conclude that it is in the public interest, essential to the national defense and necessary to aid, protect, and foster commerce to amend the Walsh-Healey and Davis-Bacon Acts in order to prevent these unknown and mythical conditions from arising and continuing to plague us.

At a time when all Members of the Congress should be cooperating to aid in the restoration of the prestige of the legislative branch of the Government, we are asked by the committee to make findings regarding the Walsh-Healey and Davis-Bacon Acts that are not based on fact or founded upon fact. Because of that, I say with all deference that they seem out of place here and ridiculous on their face. If we make such findings, what weight can we expect for congressional action?

EFFECT OF BILL—RETROACTIVITY

I wish to speak briefly upon the retroactive effect of the bill.

The actual effect of the bill on the Walsh-Healey and Davis-Bacon Acts is difficult to determine in view of the fact that we are compelled to act with a blindfold placed over our eyes.

As to past activities, we are asked to excuse violations of the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the Walsh-Healey Act and the minimum-wage provisions of the Davis-Bacon Act, except where the employer had expressly or impliedly agreed with the employee to pay for the work.

The purpose of Congress in passing these acts was to prevent Government contracts being used to force labor standards down. Before these laws were enacted Government contract practice had that effect. The lowest bidder was most likely the bidder who maintained the poorest labor standards, and the Government was required by law to contract with the lowest bidder. This bill now would reward those contractors who maintained the lowest labor standards. It makes no difference that the employer solemnly and in writing promised the Government as a condition of obtaining a Government contract that he would pay his employees as required by one of these acts, and that he and his competitors took into consideration the cost of keeping that promise in bidding for the contract.

He can now avoid that liability if he has the foresight not to pay for such activities. If this bill, as I assume it is, is an attempt to do legislative equity, this provision is not germane to it. It does not do equity; it gives a reward of Government money to employers who were enterprising enough to violate the terms of contracts under which they were working.

EFFECT AS TO THE FUTURE OF EXISTING CONTRACTS

The effects of this bill insofar as it relates to the Walsh-Healey and Davis-Bacon Acts are twofold.

As to contracts let in the past but not yet completed, it allows employers to escape from obligations which they voluntarily assumed when they sought Government business. They are not asked to reduce the price charged the Government for the favor which this bill grants them. As to existing contracts, this bill would also grant a subsidy to those who wish to disregard their contract obligations.

EFFECT ON FUTURE CONTRACTS

As I said before, the purpose of the Walsh-Healey and Davis-Bacon Acts was to eliminate the downward pull Government contracts previously had on labor standards. This bill, by allowing each employer to establish his own standard for counting hours of work, will have the effect of returning the Government-contract field to the employers, who can establish the custom of paying their employees for the least portion of their worktime. In other words, Government business will again be monopolized by those employers having the poorest labor standards.

RELIANCE ON ADMINISTRATIVE RULINGS

Speaking now of the provision for reliance on administrative rulings, this provision is unclear. It speaks of "liability for an additional amount as liquidated or other damages under the Walsh-Healey Act. This section—correct me if I am wrong—means that if an employee sues and recovers for the wages he should have been paid the Government cannot subsequently sue and recover liquidated damages for the same violation of the Walsh-Healey Act if the action is based on an act done in accord with or in reliance on some administrative ruling. It is at this point that this subsection is objectionable. Like the rest of the bill, it is loosely drawn. It does not explain what administrative officials it refers to.

I think that the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] is a good amendment, and I hope it will be adopted, if the bill which the committee has reported is finally to be passed by the Senate. Perhaps the defect I now have in mind has been corrected by the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. Nonetheless, as the bill stands at the present time it does not explain what administrative ruling is referred to.

The Secretary of Labor alone is charged with the administraion of the act. This language probably was intended to refer to the Secretary of Labor and the Administrator of the Public Contract Division. It is broad enough, however, to include every employee of the Government in every department. If it were confined to action taken in accord with and in reliance on such official's statement there might be some justification for the language. As this stands now, it may be that all the employer has to do to make his defense is to hunt up some opinion of some Government employee with which his action is in accord, regardless of whether it was right or wrong and regardless of whether the employer relied on it. Similarly, if he relies on some such opinion, the employer is protected, even though he did not interpret and apply it correctly.

Mr. President, just a word with reference to ambiguity.

We are considering legislation whose avowed purpose is primarily to clarify the wage-and-hour laws as to the types of activities for which workers may claim minimum wages or overtime, to the end that the problems raised by the so-called portal-to-portal claims may be equitably met.

It takes no great lawyer to discern at a glance, however, that this bill goes far beyond what is required to meet the portal-to-portal problem; and it takes even less of a lawyer to see that, far from providing clarification, this bill would write into the wage-and-hour laws ambiguities so gross, and so numerous that only years of litigation will begin to provide the answers to the doubts created.

Now, I do not for the moment contend that Congress can ever legislate on the problems to which our complex economic structure gives rise without leaving many unanswered questions. Indeed, one of the chief reasons for the creation of independent administrative tribunals is the fact that Congress cannot hope to foresee the complex maze of issues that will arise in the enforcement of legislation regulating our economic affairs. But it is one thing to pass a law which defines the scope of regulation in definite though general terms, and another to proscribe and restrict the application of remedial legislation in terms so vague, and so indefinite that the problem of statutory interpretation becomes a matter of choosing on a wholly arbitrary basis among a number of possible meanings. That is what we face in this bill; and this is particularly unconscionable when so many of the ambiguities militate against the maintenance of a decent standard of living for the American worker.

Let us look at this bill and see if my charge can be sustained. Two examples should suffice.

Section III is designed to prevent, except under certain conditions, a claim by employees to be compensated for so-called portal-to-portal activities. How are these noncompensable activities defined? They are defined so as to include, first, "walking, riding, or traveling to and from the actual place of performance of the principal activity or activities which such employee is employed to perform," and, secondly, "activities which are preliminary to or postliminary to said principal activity or activities," where either of these two groups of activities occur either "prior to the time on any particular workday at which such employee commences, or subsequent to the time on any particular workday at which he ceases such principal activity or activities," and where these otherwise excluded activities are not compensable under contracts, or custom and practice.

Let us look at this provision, bearing in mind that we are not dealing with a provision that has anything to do with the existing portal-to-portal claims, but with a provision affecting the future operation of the wage-and-hour laws. And let us put aside for the moment the consideration of what is left to the efficacy of the act, and to the uniformity of its application when we permit elusive customs and practices to be the test of what activities are compensable. Let us consider only the issue to which I am presently directing your attention—namely, the fact that the language of this bill is so vague and confusing that it cannot be applied except under conditions that will make the wage-and-hour law a haven for unemployed attorneys.

Here are but a few of the questions that arise. What is the principal activity of a worker in a typical small plant who performs a number of unrelated functions? What is the actual place of performance of the principal activities of a worker whose functions carry him to several different places? How can we term activities noncompensable if they occur prior to or subsequent to the workday when the very issue in the problem is whether or not the workday begins with the preliminary activities and ends with the postliminary activities? What are to be the criteria of custom or practice? How can you decide whether custom or practice is or is not consistent with a nonwritten contract where employer and employee advance conflicting interpretations as to what they intended the contract to mean?

Let us take our second example of dangerous ambiguity from part IV, section 10, which exempts from liability to injunctions, criminal prosecution, or recovery of liquidated damages in employee suits under the Fair Labor Standards Act an employer who acts in good faith "in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice of the Administrator." Again let us set aside the issue as to whether we should invite the violator, who always will claim he acted in good faith in his interpretation of an interpretation or practice of the Administrator, to evade the act. Let us look only at the litigation-producing ambiguity of this provision. What tests can possibly be applied to determine good faith? Is an employer permitted to rely on the Administrator's rulings so long as they are confined to his individual case, or does this immunity extend to cases in which he relies on rulings of the Administrator which he believes touch on his problem but which in reality dealt with an issue entirely unrelated to that of the employer in question?

Mr. President, the Washington Post for March 12, 1947, carries a Grin and Bear It cartoon in which a legislative committee is being addressed by one of its members in these terms: "I admit this new bill is too complicated to understand. We will just have to pass it to find out how it works." I cannot believe that this Congress, in its first piece of labor legislation, will deliberately follow this example.

With reference to limitations of action section 9 (b) (1) limits suits by employees against their employer to a period of 2 years. It assumes, however, that an employee suing his employer under this act can recover double damages in such an action, as is the case in suits under the Fair Labor Standards Act, where the employee can recover an additional amount as liquidated damages. The Walsh-Healey Act does not permit an employee to recover such an additional amount in a suit against his employer. Double recovery can be had by an employee only, if at all, when, after the employee has recovered his unpaid wages, the Government sues the employer and recovers under section 2 of the act for liquidated damages for breach of contract, and subsequently pays the money recovered over to the employee who was underpaid. If the phrase "an additional amount as liquidated damages" has any meaning, it applies to that situation. It seems hardly just to penalize the employee because the Government is dilatory in bringing action against the employer. This is particularly true since it applies only to those employees who brought their actions early. Moreover, it makes the Government's right to recover dependent on the inactivity of employees.

GOOD FAITH

Mr. President, certainty and predictability have always been regarded as the fundamental attributes of sound legislation. But a remedial statute which purports to impose specific duties and obligations on designated classes, and which enables those on whom those duties and obligations are imposed to evade them with ease, completely fails of its purpose and is a mockery of the popular will which the statute in question was enacted to express and to effectuate.

House bill 2157 has been introduced to rectify alleged inequities which have arisen in the application of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. Its most zealous proponents have insisted that the minimum labor standards which the Government has so laboriously erected for the protection of the economically defenseless will remain unaltered and unaffected by House bill 2157. But section 10 of the proposed measure goes far beyond the rectification of any alleged portal-to-portal pay abuses, for, as I read it, it holds within itself the possibility of permitting, to say the least, employers to free themselves from all penalty or liability, except liability for unpaid wages in an employee suit, when they fail to comply with the Fair Labor Standards Act, if they claim to have acted in good faith in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, or practice of the Administrator. Thereby, I believe, House bill 2157 would help the unethical employer to evade the act and to engage in unfair competition at the expense of the minimum living standards of his employees and also to the detriment of the stability of his business competitors and community.

The phrase "good faith" has been judicially defined in numerous instances. These definitions have varied from case to case. They are almost as varied as the causes which give rise to portal-to-portal pay suits. In some decisions it has been held to denote honesty of purpose, the actual existing state of the mind, without regard to what it should be from given standards of law and reason. In others, however, it has been defined as honesty of intention, and freedom from knowledge of circumstances which ought to put the defendant upon inquiry. This bill gives not the slightest clue to which of these, or the infinite number of other definitions, it refers. Evidence of lack of good faith is always difficult to secure, and is of doubtful probative weight, save in the most obvious situations.

Moreover, neither the act nor this bill establishes, except in a few special instances, formal provision for the issuance of interpretations, rulings, or opinions by the Administrator. All of the latter's acts in this respect are merely informal viewpoints expressed to the employer informally. There are no provisions for hearing, or for notice to the employees affected, or for opportunity to present facts or argument in favor of or in opposition to the Administrator's expression of opinion. Yet, an employer can point to such an opinion and can claim that he relied on it when he failed to comply with the act. As a matter of fact, the bill does not even require that the employer rely on an opinion issued to him. He can point to some opinion issued to another person which he may have heard or read about, and he can claim he relied on that when he committed the violation.

But that is not all. A violator can escape liability by claiming reliance on a "practice" of the Administrator. I hope we shall amend the act so as to eliminate that possibility, at least. Just what constitutes a practice of the Administrator? There may be cases which the Administrator may consider technically in violation of the statute, but which, because of a lack of funds or because other cases are more urgent or significant, may not be acted upon. Does an employer thus have a right to disobey the act because he has learned of such an administrative practice or act, and then says, "I followed the practice of the Administrator"?

Let us consider some of the concrete problems that probably would arise to plague us if this bill becomes law. If Johnny Jones, a clerk in the public contracts office, attempts to answer an employer's question, is reliance upon such a reply a complete defense to punishment for violation of the act? If a Wage and Hour Division's inspector visits company X, and if company Y then fails to comply with the Fair Labor Standards Act in the belief, in alleged good faith, of course, that its action is similar to an act by company X which the inspector did not overtly disapprove or condemn, is company Y justified in relying on this so-called administrative interpretation or practice? Or if the inspector has failed to visit company Y for a long period, while visiting company Y's competitors, does that constitute an administrative practice signifying approval of Y's activities? Does good faith excuse ignorance of the law, or of the facts, or both? No one can answer, because the only source of illumination—the statute itself—has been cloaked in the dark and unrevealing cloak of ambiguity.

Section 10, Mr. President, solving no problems, and resolving no doubts, opens wide the Pandora's box of unanticipated evils. We shall be plagued for years to come by the hornets of doubt and uncertainty. Social gains may evaporate as litigation multiplies. Those millions of American wage earners whose needs for decent housing, food, and clothing for themselves and their families inspired the humanitarian legislation which now is being subjected to such destructive amendment, may again find their minimum living standards controlled by the blind play of supply and demand, instead of by the conscience and sense of decency of a great and fair-minded people. Surely, the proponents of this bill have no mandate from the people to take such a backward leap.

I am by no means opposed to a provision which would authorize the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division to issue legally effective regulations and definitions in accordance with law, binding on both employers and employees and which would protect those who rely on such official rulings. But that is a far cry from the provisions of section 10 of this bill, which cut only one way—in favor of the employer who may be inclined to cut corners to gain a competitive advantage. I am not averse to incorporation into law of those principles of good faith which must govern the conduct of men of good will if the fabric of our society is to endure. But I would also like to see this Congress keep good faith with the American people. That requires a strengthening, not a weakening, of laws, like the Fair Labor Standards Act which were designed to protect the health, well-being, and dignity of the individual wage earner. I sincerely hope the majority party will recognize this and will place the national welfare above selfish and narrow partisan advantage, and I hope that before we conclude our action on this subject we shall see the wisdom of pursuing such a course.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

Mr. President, I have gone carefully over the record of the hearings before the Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee and the majority report which accompanies the bill we are considering. I have been impressed by the care with which members of the committee pursued certain portal-to-portal questions. However, I have not risen to discuss those points. I should like to address myself to another aspect of the bill before us, one which I believe to be of vital importance. It was the subject of one of the early amendments I offered, and it is the subject of a provision of the McCarran-McGrath amendment, already proposed. It deals with the problem of the statute of limitations. This subject hardly concerns the portal-to-portal issue at all, since that issue would be taken care of, in the bill reported by the committee, by various methods which the committee has seen fit to propose to prevent the successful maintenance of such suits.

In the committee's concern over that issue, other wage-and-hour law problems in this bill have been touched on only in passing in both the hearings and the majority report. I wish there had been opportunity for the committee which held the hearings to have pursued some of these other problems as fully as they have the portal-to-portal issue itself. For example, the committee has proposed a 2-year statute of limitations for all actions arising under the Fair Labor Standards Act. I repeat that this question does not concern the portal-to-portal issue, since the committee proposes that that issue be taken care of in other ways. Nowhere in the committee bill or report is there any suggestion that an unreasonably short statute of limitations would interfere with the rights of workers or foster the unfair competition which the act sought to avoid. In the proposed findings and policy, it is suggested that the "varying and extended periods of time for which, under the laws of the several States, potential retroactive liability may be imposed upon employers, has given rise to great difficulties to the sound and orderly conduct of business and industry." There is no suggestion as to the effect on compliance with the act, or administration, or on the workers—largely unorganized and often underpaid—for whom the act was developed, or on the majority of well-meaning and scrupulous employers who might be crippled by unfair competitors if the act became substantially less enforceable.

Mr. President, when we consider the appropriate period of limitation, I do not believe that we should limit our attention to the needs of those who have been or will be willful or unwitting violators of the law. Other law was written for their benefit. We should keep in mind that this law was written, not for the benefit of employers, but for the benefit of employees; and when we write a statute of limitations in that connection, we should write it in the light that we are doing something to protect the employee, for he is the one who is given the rights under the statute. The employer is the one on whom the obligations are imposed, and we should do nothing to cut down the employees' rights any more than is absolutely essential.

I think we should pay attention to the unfair competition of these willful or unwitting violators of the law with those who have made every effort to comply with all the standards which Congress has intended. I think we should give heed to the broad purposes of general welfare which the Congress had in mind when these laws were passed, and ask ourselves whether these purposes can adequately be safeguarded with a short statute of limitation. I believe that we should inquire into the effects on the administration of the act; and, above all, it seems to me to be imperative that we should have regard to whether an unreasonably short statute of limitation will substantially deprive the underpaid workers of the minimum standards which Congress intended they should have when the Fair Labor Standards Act was passed. These are the basic questions, it seems to me, that the members of the Committee on the Judiciary should have concerned themselves with when they considered the limit which a uniform Federal statute should have. But I find no evidence, Mr. President, either in the hearings, in the report of the committee, or in the wording of the bill itself, that the committee in fact asked or gave weight to any of these basic questions. Instead, in all of these sources there is ample evidence that the consideration of the majority of the committee was limited to their regard for the willful or unwitting violators of the law; they were concerned with the liabilities which these willful or unwitting violators might have now or in the future; they expressed no concern that these same liabilities were unpaid wages, and that hundreds of thousands of American workers may have experienced severe economic distress because wages lawfully due them had unlawfully been withheld.

Mr. President, I propose to consider these very factors on which the Judiciary Committee might have based their judgment, but did not, and to show why a longer statute of limitation is needed for the law-abiding employer to prevent unfair competition, for the general welfare, for sound and efficient administration, as well as for the workers of this great country, particularly the unorganized workers, who need to have a reasonable statute of limitation to safeguard the rights we intended they should have.

Mr. President, I wish to remind all Senators that the members of organized labor hardly need the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act. It is the man who is not a member of the labor union who needs the protection of this law, and if it is destroyed, we will drive more and more Americans to the necessity of joining labor unions; not that perhaps any of us have any objection to that, but I thought it might be apropos to make the observation.

Let me state that I agree with the majority report and bill on one point, that a uniform Federal statute of limitation is desirable. I believe it is needed for quite different reasons than the limitation of liability of law violators to which the majority apparently gave sole heed. It seems to me that a uniform period is needed to make sure that the minimum standards which Congress intended to prevail should not be jeopardized.

The present situation means that the rights of employees vary from State to State. It means, in effect, that the minimum standards which Congress intended to have uniform application throughout the length and breadth of this country are in fact more effective in some areas than in others depending on the accident of geography, and the geographic crazy quilt of applicable statutes. As a matter of fact, there have been instances where within the same State different courts, when they faced the task of determining which period applied, arrived at quite different conclusions.

It is clear that employees residing in the 13 most populous States which provide for a period of 6 years or more for filing claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act, inevitably derive a greater share of the benefits Congress intended to confer upon them than will those workers who reside in the 6 States which provide a period of only 1 year. Similarly, conscientious employers—and I believe that the bulk of employers are conscientious—who desire to comply with and receive the competitive protection which the Fair Labor Standards Act affords, will be penalized in direct ratio to the number of years of limitation provided by local law. The unscrupulous employer in a State with a 1-year statute, for example, would be far more inclined to gamble, first, on the probability that the violation would not be detected, second, on the chance that although detected, the employee would be naturally reluctant to sue, and third, even if detected and successfully prosecuted, the claim would be limited to the unreasonably short period of 1 year, and he might, as this bill would almost certainly provide, have his liability limited to those back wages which the law provided that in any case he should have paid, and, regardless of the gravity of his fault, he would probably not be subjected to paying liquidated damages.

When we turn to the question of the period of limitation which is reasonable I believe we should turn in the first instance to the judgment of the several States. When the Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted, 28 States had statutes of limitation of 5 or 6 years. These States had three-fourths of the employees affected by the Fair Labor Standards Act. Ninety-five percent of the covered employees were in States which had periods of 3 years or more. I believe these facts are most significant, and they amply support, to my mind, a period substantially longer than the 2-year period recommended by the majority of the committee.

Many of these State statutes of limitations concern a general class of actions, such as action on verbal or written contracts. It has been urged by some proponents of an excessively short period of limitation that when we consider the experience of the various States, we pay attention only to those States which have specifically passed statutes of limitations with respect to recovery under minimum wage rates. Such a limitation, it seems to me, would be most unwise.

In the first place, there are only 11 such States, and nothing has been said which would indicate that those 11 States constitute a representative cross section of the problems of the entire country. In fact, the major industrial States, such as California, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and others, including the great bulk of the workers covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act, are conspicuous either by their absence from this list of States which have felt that the general statute of limitations should be shortened with respect to recovery under wage-and-hour laws, or else, as in Maryland, Ohio, and Tennessee, they have decided on a 3-year statute.

In the second place, most of the States which have reduced the statutes of limitations applicable to wage collections under minimum wage laws are States which have had no experience of their own with minimum wage laws, and consequently do not have the same historical perspective as to the problem of the wage earner under minimum wage laws which 26 States and the District of Columbia have. If we take into consideration the number of workers affected, States with minimum wage laws of their own have an average statute of 4.8 years, 2 years longer than those States without such experience.

In the third place, it seems to me that to consider only the States which have changed their laws is a good deal like considering only the views of a single economic or political group in the Gallup polls. In 22 States bills have been introduced in the legislatures, since the Fair Labor Standards Act became effective through the end of 1946, to reduce the statutes of limitations applicable to actions arising under that act. Half of these States have refused to take any action whatsoever to deprive the low-paid worker of the benefits of the statute of limitations in effect when the Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted. In the 26 other States, there appeared to be so little justification for discrimination against the underpaid worker that no bill had even been introduced by the end of 1946, over 8 years since the Fair Labor Standards Act became effective.

Personally, I should prefer that we pay no attention to these shortened statutes, since in some cases they may represent a competitive undercutting of the standards which Congress intended. I think we should place chief reliance either on the average statute of limitation at the time the Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted, or alternatively to the average period permitted in those States which have had experience with minimum-wage laws of their own. On both these bases, the average is almost exactly 5 years. Even today, a period shorter than 5 years would mean that 59.2 percent of the covered workers would be denied rights which they now have under their own State statutes of limitation.

The greatest concession I would make to the consideration of those States which have reduced their periods would be to take their present periods into consideration, together with the present periods of the 37 other States and the District of Columbia, which have not seen any need to reduce the applicable period. On this basis, Mr. President, I present for the record a table showing the number of States and covered employees with the length of period applicable:

Present statutes of limitation, all States and District of Columbia

Period of limitation	Number		Simple percentage
	States and District of Columbia	Covered employees (estimated 1945)	States	Covered employees
Total	49.0	20,280,000	100.0	100.0
1 year	6.0	960,000	12.2	4.7
2 years	5.0	1,570,000	10.2	7.7
3 years	14.0	5,560,000	28.6	27.4
4 years	3.0	210,000	6.1	1.0
5 years	5.0	2,730,000	10.2	13.5
6 years or more	16.0	9,250,000	32.7	45.7
Average period	3.8	4.4

This table shows that the average statute of limitation at the present time in the 48 States plus the District of Columbia is 3.8 years. It further shows that when the number of affected employees is taken into consideration, the average period is 4.4 years, since the larger, industrial States have generally preferred a longer period. It shows further that less than 5 percent of the covered employees would have their rights increased by a 2-year statute of limitation, while no less than 88 percent would have their rights reduced, in some cases very sharply, while the remaining employees would not be affected.

On a 1-year basis more than 95 percent of the workers would have their present rights reduced. When we count also the amount to which their potential rights would be reduced under a 1-year statute of limitation, we come to the astonishing conclusion that such an unreasonably short period would take away 99 percent of the rights which workers now have under the present State statutes of limitation. I am gratified that the Judiciary Committee at least refused to accept the 1-year proposal that came to it in some of the bills which were considered; but even on a 2-year basis the present rights would be very gravely reduced. Seven out of eight employees would have a shorter period in which to exert their rights than they now have, and when we take into account also the amount of reduction of their rights, we come out with the result that 96 percent of the potential rights of workers would be eliminated by a 2-year statute. I repeat, Mr. President, the first labor bill reported out by a committee of the Eightieth Congress would wipe out not only all sorts of claims for the past, but would wipe out 96 percent of the potential opportunity in the future to press what claims were left.

There may be some present who will object that the workers often do not and should not take advantage of the full period of limitation now allowed them. I grant that and recognize that if there were no other restrictions involved in future suits, a 99-percent figure would be too high. However, since this bill in a number of highly important other directions also makes recovery unlikely, I think we should seriously ponder the fact that the very great bulk of future rights would be eliminated.

Since the majority report has not given attention to the likelihood of obtaining general compliance under a 2-year statute, let me present a picture of the general enforcement situation.

These facts I have secured from the Government agencies involved. The Wage and Hour Division in its annual report for 1946 states that there are currently about 550,000 establishments with employees subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act. During 1946 the Division inspected 42,000 of these great establishments. At that rate of inspection it is certain that the great bulk of employers could illegally withhold money from an employee for more than 2 years before the Division would even have the personnel to find it out.

Under a 2-year statute the enforcement procedure outlined above would not be effective unless most violating establishments were inspected within a short time after the violations started. If only the present inspection staff were available, the Division would fall far short of this objective. During the 8 years that the Fair Labor Standards Act has been in effect, some 900,000 different establishments have been subject to its provisions at one time or another. A total of about 230,000 of these establishments had been inspected at least once by June 30, 1946, at which time, it is estimated, 60,000 of all inspected establishments no longer were in business. The number of establishments which have not been inspected and have gone out of business or have been transferred to new owners during those years, 290,000, is larger than the total number of establishments inspected, and includes primarily small, unstable establishments of the type in which serious violations are most likely to occur. Nearly 380,000 establishments, or two-thirds of the total number of currently operating covered establishments, have not been inspected. If past trends in business turnover continue, about 50,000 new establishments subject to the acts will go out of business each year, and approximately an equal number of new ones will take their place.

It is apparent that it would not be possible to make inspections in time to secure restitution on violations which occurred before the passage of the bill, regardless of the size of the inspection staff. To get to establishments which continued or began violations after the bill was passed would mean inspecting them within a short time of its effective date in order to be on time for effective action since 4 months are required to complete inspections and to arrange for final settlement. This, then, would require inspecting establishments which are now in violation, inspecting new establishments, especially those in industries and areas in which violations are widespread, within a short time of their opening, and reinspecting every 2 years establishments which the first inspection indicated might resume violation.

It would thus not only be impossible to inspect on a wide enough basis to protect rights already accrued, but the gap between the 2-year period of violating claims and the one-twelfth inspections which can now be made would continue to be disproportionate in future years.

This is not to imply that the majority of employers in the country are violating the Wages and Hours Act. The Wage and Hour Division states that it inspects where a need for enforcement is indicated, and perhaps a measure of its success in this endeavor is the high ratio of violations found. It is clear, however, that it is not the employer who complies with the act that is the chief concern; it is the chiseler, the corner cutter, and the down-right unscrupulous employer to whom we need to give attention. It is this small percentage of employers who drag down business standards and make it harder for the overwhelming majority of American businessmen to compete on a decent basis. These are the men for whom a Fair Labor Standards Act is needed—call it a Fair Labor Competition Act—and these are the men who should be kept in mind as we consider this bill.

A few more figures will show that this small percentage of employers is the crux of the problem. In 1946 the Wage and Hour Division reinspected over 8,300 establishments that had previously been inspected. Fifty-six percent of these establishments were found to be in violation of the minimum wage, overtime, or child-labor provisions, with 34 percent in substantial violation of the law. Almost one-fifth of the establishments were found with the same type of violation as had been found in the previous visit to the plant. With this kind of employer what good is a 2-year statute of limitations? It becomes a mockery, an invitation to lawlessness; it is utterly and totally inadequate unless we are prepared to greatly enlarge the Division's enforcement staff.

Mr. President, I have looked in vain in the hearings, and in the report or the bill itself, for such a recommendation by the majority of the committee, which failed to give proper attention to the effect which the sweeping amendments of the Fair Labor Standards Act would have on the problems of attaining general compliance with the fair labor standards in the three laws that we here seek to effect.

It is often said that the wage and hour law is self-enforcing, that the provision—section 16 (b)—which gives employees the right to sue in their own names takes care of enforcement. The 1946 annual report of the Division states, however, that employees' suits have been instituted in only a small percentage of cases in which substantial violations were found. In fact, not only do few workers sue their employers, but only 14 percent of the inspections were made as a result of complaints.

It is evident that employees are slow to sue for their back wages, even slow to file complaints. Either they are afraid to sue or file a complaint, or they simply do not know what their rights are under the law. This is particularly true of the workers who do not belong to a union. Nearly half of the workers covered by the wage and hour law are not members of organized unions.

The small figures representing employee suits and complaints do not mean that the rest of the employers were complying with the act. But because of the apparent attitude of the majority of the committee, I think we should give careful attention to these facts. One-half of the 42,000 establishments inspected in 1946 were in violation of major provisions of the act, 38 percent of those inspected in substantial violation. In that 1 year alone, the Division found over $21,000,000 due as back wages, and this money was owed to 365,000 employees. This was a year of generally high wages and high profits, yet 11 percent of the establishments inspected were in violation of the minimum wage provisions of the act. They would not pay 40 cents an hour.

The framers of the Fair Labor Standards Act believed that the possibility of employee suits would greatly help in obtaining general compliance. The risk of liquidated damages may help accomplish this, but the figures I have just given indicate clearly that we cannot depend for enforcement upon the worker by his actually bringing suit to enforce the act, that in thousands of establishments there are violations going on which the employees—through meekness or lack of knowledge of the law, through weakness or fear—do not bring to light. And every violation means that the law-abiding employer is put at a competitive disadvantage. Regardless of whether the violation is intentional or not, the competitor of the violator operates at a disadvantage.

Let us consider what a workingman is up against in trying to collect illegally withheld wages and how he would stand at the end of 2 years after his employer first began to violate the law.

The average worker is not inclined to be a lawyer. He does not know the details of the laws that are designed to protect him. He is kept pretty well occupied in doing his work and then going home to be with his family. He cannot sit down and study these statutes and he does not have the money to hire counsel to keep him advised of his rights. For information he has to rely either on his employer or on the governmental agencies charged with enforcing these laws. Now the workingman is understandably pretty cautious about asking his employer what his rights are, and in the case of an employer who has illegally withheld wages, any employee is not going to his employer for any such information. So he depends on the Wage and Hour Division as far as the wage and hour law is concerned. He relies upon the Wage and Hour Division, the agency which his Government has set up to protect him. We encourage him to rely upon it. He depends upon it, and he waits for it to tell him whether his employer is in violation of the law that the Congress has written.

The average worker, Mr. President, is not inclined to complain against his employer while working for him. We know that to be so. He is afraid of being discriminated against or of losing his job altogether, particularly if he is not a member of a strong union. I remind the Senate again that 9,000,000 employees covered by the act are not union members at all. If an employee thinks he has back wages coming to him and he is willing to register a complaint with the Wage and Hour Division, the complaint may well be filed weeks or months after he has left his job. And when a complaint is made, an employee ordinarily waits until the Wage and Hour Division has checked up on the complaint before going to court, if he goes to court at all. If this were not so our courts would be more crowded with portal-to-portal suits than they now are. If every worker were to feel that in cases where his employer was in violation of the law he could not depend upon the Wage and Hour Division, but must himself file suit in court to protect himself it would result in making of all courts of the United States, Federal and State, small claims courts.

If the Wage and Hour Division finds back wages due to an employee but it is unable to persuade the employer to make voluntary restitution—since the Division does not have the right to sue for illegally withheld wages—only then does the employee start to consider bringing suit in court for his unpaid wages. But by then, several months will have passed since the violations occurred so that there probably would be back wages still due to the employee for only a few months of the 2-year period allowed to him—not enough to make it worth while to pay a lawyer and spend time and trouble in suit. The employee would probably drop the whole matter and charge it up to experience, even though he may well resent having the cards stacked against his getting a fair deal. This is just one example of how a chiseling employer would be encouraged by too short a statute of limitations to continue his chiseling.

And if an employee finally does sue him, since half or more of the 2-year period would probably have elapsed before suit was begun, even with double damages the employer would normally have to pay only what the back wages for the 2-year period would have been. In other words, if the employer is successfully sued he can normally depend on having to pay no more than the total amount of back wages, and he can bank on the fact that usually only a small proportion of the employees would dare to sue. The unscrupulous and unfair employer would simply regard any additional costs he would have to pay as a kind of license fee for being permitted to engage in lawbreaking.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I think I have data from one of the agencies of the Government which indicates that the greatest number of these suits, namely, 766, was filed in the month of December of last year, and that the greatest number filed in any previous month was 303, filed in the month of November. The greatest number filed in any previous month prior thereto was in October, when the suits filed numbered only 189. I wondered if the Senator had any opinion, out of his deep study of this subject, as to whether or not the filing of a larger number of these suits was accelerated by the newspaper publicity and the campaign that was being launched in the Congress at the beginning of the present session of the Congress to outlaw claims of this nature, and whether a great many individuals rushed into the courts to try to get their claims filed before the threatened elimination by the Congress of the possibility of filing claims.

Mr. McGRATH. An affirmative answer to the Senator's question would seem to me to be reasonable and logical. Though I have made no study of the particular matter, I think that very properly might be the answer.

Mr. President, I have discussed the situation as it exists under the present law with the presently applicable statutes of limitation. It seems to me from these facts that a reasonable man honestly interested in the standards of these three acts which would be amended by this bill, must come to the conclusion that the present level of enforcement is inadequate, and that should the country undergo a new period of depression, such as we had the misfortune to experience in the years beginning with 1929, there would be grave doubt that there could be general compliance with the act, because the well-meaning employers would be forced by the chiseling minority which made a successful gamble on evasion to cut corners themselves. The 2-year statute of limitation would cut almost in two the present average statute, if we do not consider the relative number of workers in each of the States; and if we consider the relative number of workers, it would cut the present average to somewhat less than 50 percent of the present time available. In consequence, the difficulties of securing effective compliance would be more than than doubled by the 2-year statute of limitation alone.

However, the reduced statute of limitation is not the only way in which the pending bill would seriously endanger enforcement of the basic standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The act at present has a provision that employees may obtain not only the amount of unpaid wages but also an additional equal amount as liquidated damages. These liquidated damages were made part of the act originally because the Congress realized that an employee who is forced to wait for an unconscionably long time for the money Congress intended him to receive had been injured. Frequently such employees would fall into the clutches of loan sharks, and would have to pay back to such unscrupulous money lenders a great deal more than they had borrowed. By being so victimized, the health of their families might easily have been endangered. Congress, however, recognized that it would be difficult to establish exactly how much the damage had been and provided accordingly for a uniform amount equal to the actual underpayment of wages.

Congress also recognized that the possibility of having to pay not only the illegally withheld wages, but also an additional equal amount would prove to be an important deterrent to evasion of the law. Although there have been relatively few employee suits, as I have already mentioned, prior to the recent series of portal-to-portal suits, nevertheless, the possibility of increased liability has unquestionably caused many of the less scrupulous employers to hesitate before taking a gamble.

That deterrent effect would be greatly reduced by the 2-year statute of limitation alone, since, as I have already stated, the average unorganized employee who is uncertain of the application of the law and fearful of his employment rights, necessarily relies on the Wage and Hour Division, and frequently half of the 2-year period which would be permitted, would have been used up in waiting for a wage-and-hour inspection, waiting for restitution by the employer as a result of that inspection, and in the further delays in debating whether to file suit, in choosing a lawyer, and in preparing evidence. In consequence, since half of the available 2 years would often have elapsed before suit is brought, the unscrupulous employer even if he is forced to pay liquidated damages for half of the period, would have a total liability no greater than the amount of illegally withheld wages.

The mutilated remains of effective employee action to enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act would virtually disappear under the further impact of the proposed new section 16 (d), shown at the bottom of page 20 and the top of page 21 of the bill. This provision would mean that there would be no possibility of liquidated damages at all if the employer had relied in good faith "on any regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice of the Administrator." This language is very sweeping. Not only does it require the plaintiff to read the mind of his employer to determine whether he really relied on the Administrator, and to determine whether he really relied in good faith, but it also requires the plaintiff or his lawyer to be extraordinarily learned in labor law. This proposed new subsection does not refer to the applicable regulations, and so forth. It is not limited to the regulations specifically authorized by the Congress when the Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted in 1938. It applies also to "order, interpretation, ruling, or practice," although nowhere in the hearings, the report of the committee, or the bill itself is there any indication as to the meaning of these terms. There is no restriction that the orders, interpretations, rulings, or practices be the result of open hearings. There is no restriction that these be issued as the result of the opportunity of giving all interested parties the chance to be heard. There is no restriction that the orders, interpretations, rulings, or practices be published. Information about the orders, interpretations, rulings, or practices may be contained in letters to individual employers under quite different circumstances, or they may be confined to confidential instructions within the agency.

Under this bramble-bush of obstacles to the successful maintenance of a suit for liquidated damages I repeat, Mr. President, the bill of the committee would wipe out the deterrent effect which the liquidated damage provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act has had in the past. The elimination in effect of this deterrent, I reiterate, Mr. President, has apparently been done without consideration as to the outcome in weakening compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act. It has apparently been done without consideration as to the resultant effects on the fair-labor standards of the bulk of the employers who would be hurt competitively by their less scrupulous competitors. It has apparently been done without consideration of the rights of underpaid employees and without consideration to the public welfare which the Fair Labor Standards Act was designed to foster.

The possibility of employee suits was envisaged by the Congress when the Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted as an important support to the maintenance of its standards. This support has generally proved to be of less importance than originally contemplated, but nevertheless the Appropriations Committees of Congress after Congress have pointed to the section of the act which provides for these suits as an important complement to the Administrator's enforcement activities. Now the Judiciary Committee proposes in effect to eliminate the possibility of employee suits, and there is no indication from the Appropriations Committees that a reconsideration of the level of enforcement activities of the Wage and Hour Division may be in order.

Those activities likewise would be gravely affected, as I have shown, by a 2-year statute of limitations. They would also be seriously impeded by the sweeping, but vague, language I have referred to in the proposed new section 16 (d), by the need to read the mind of the employer to see whether he really relied in good faith, and by the fact that the employer may rely on just any interpretation, ruling, or practice, whether or not pertinent, whether or not information on the practice was in fact restricted to the Wage and Hour Division, and so forth.

But there are still other difficulties to effective enforcement within a 2-year period to which I should like to call attention. The bill would limit compensable worktime to the time the employee worked at his principal activities, regardless of the amount of time the workers may have been required by the employer to work in preliminary or postliminary activities.

I think, Mr. President, there are extremely grave questions of national policy in permitting an employer to require large amounts of preliminary time or postliminary time without any requirement for compensation. The possibilities of abuse of this exemption are very great. Activities may be reorganized to throw all of the nonprincipal activities at the beginning or end of the day. Janitorial, custodial, auxiliary services normally performed by other workers could be required of production workers. I know that the majority of the Judiciary Committee may be inclined to discount such possibilities, just as they have apparently discounted all possibilities of law evasion and concentrated their attention on the potential liabilities of the unwitting and willful violators. We should, however, give due regard to the considered judgment of the Congress which enacted the Fair Labor Standards Act, after deliberations of more than a year. Congress was properly concerned with the dragging down of labor standards by the chiseling employer. We should also consider the judgment of the Wage and Hour Division that such employers are constantly attempting dodges to avoid their social responsibilities. We should be guided by the figures which I have cited as to the number of violations detected in the examinations made each year.

But those are not the problems in connection with "principal activity" which

I want to discuss here. The question of law enforcement is uppermost in my mind. It seems to me to be clear that the majority of the committee means that the content of the "principal activity" may vary from industry to industry, from employer to employer, or even from employee to employee in the same establishment. The administrative burden of determining just what are the "principal" activities and what are the "preliminary" and "postliminary" activities would be enormous, even if the staff of the Wage and Hour Division were to be increased accordingly. Before the Congress can pass upon these questions they must be administratively ruled on in most instances. With the present staff, which I assume the Appropriations Committee would not wish to cut, with all the increased burdens which H. R. 2157 would place on the Division—the Division would unquestionably have an even more difficult time than at present in inspecting a sufficiently large proportion of establishments to attain fair compliance.

In addition to the difficulties involved in the unreasonably short period of a 2-year statute of limitation, the uncertainties of the "reliance in good faith" provision, and the problems of ascertaining just what are the "principal" activities of an employee, the bill imposes a further complication, that of determining just what are the express provisions of a written or nonwritten contract or a custom or practice. At the very least, these additional requirements are very time-consuming.

All of these difficulties will mean, Mr. President, that the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division can hope to inspect substantially less than 1 out of 12 establishment, which he otherwise would be able to do. There is nothing whatsoever in the hearings, the report, or the bill itself to suggest that a 1 in 12 ratio is adequate, and I am firmly convinced, Mr. President, that a ratio this small inevitably invites the gamble that the violator would not be caught, and that that gamble, if generally successful, inevitably rots away the basic structure of the fair labor standards in these acts.

The erosion of fair-labor standards among the unorganized workers which will result from a failure to secure general compliance with these acts because of the excessively short statute of limitations and the other difficulties I have just outlined will have its inevitable effects throughout our economy. The fair-minded, scrupulous employer will be burdened with the unfair practices of the less scrupulous, the unorganized worker will be deprived of the protection which he should have, and the general welfare intended when these acts were originally passed will have been forgotten.

Mr. President, many of these evils can be avoided by a reasonable statute of limitation, a statute which would not deprive workers of the rights they now enjoy. For that reason, Mr. President, I hope that at the proper time, when the vote is taken, Members of the Senate will pay heed at least to that provision of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and myself, and change the period of the statute of limitations provided in the committee bill to that which we suggest, namely, 3 years.

These are the facts which I have tried to dwell upon in the committee. These are the forebodings which I see in the future if the Congress should enact this proposed legislation. Having expressed them, I hope they may find root in the hearts of some of the Members of this body, and that, all working together and continuing to consider this problem, we may be able to meet what I said in the beginning I regarded as a temporary emergency, without at the same time doing irreparable damage to three of the greatest laws ever placed upon the statute books of this country, namely, the wage-hour law, the Walsh-Healey Act, and the Bacon-Davis Act.

DEMORALIZATION OF COMMODITY MARKETS

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the commodity markets of our Nation have been fluctuating wildly during recent weeks. Yesterday wheat sold above $3 per bushel on the Chicago market. I understand that this is the result of a "technical corner" that exists in our grain markets. I am informed that this situation is much different from any we have experienced in the past in that this time it is charged that the Government of the United States itself is a principal violator. Our Government agencies are reported to have been buying heavily on the advancing markets. Until today more wheat has been purchased for March than it will mathematically be possible to deliver. This situation has been aggravated even more by the severe shortages of boxcars during the recent weeks which greatly reduced the delivery of grain to the terminal markets.

Mr. President, this is not the first time that Government purchases have demoralized our commodity markets. I mention another commodity which has been receiving a great deal of attention lately, namely, meat. During recent weeks we have seen meat, especially pork, sell at fantastic prices and we have heard Government officials bewailing the fate of the consumers and shouting charges that all this was a result of the Republican Party wrecking the OPA.

I have here some figures of Government purchases during the past few months which prove that the Government itself either intentionally or through poor management is responsible for the erratic markets of recent weeks. Based on the report of the officers in charge of procurement for our armed forces, we find that during the past 3 months alone, for instance, they purchased over 36,000,000 pounds of pork, while their estimated requirements for the same period were approximately 14,000,000 pounds. Thus, they have purchased more than double their requirements at the highest prices on record, and at the same time made it practically impossible for the housewife to get a pork chop except at prohibitive prices.

Let us examine Government purchases of bacon. We find that during the past 3 months they have purchased over 11,000,000 pounds of bacon, while for the previous 3 months their purchases totaled less than 2,500,000 pounds, or an increase of nearly 500 percent.

Sausage purchases totaled nearly 25,000,000 pounds for the past 3 months, while their requirements for the same period were approximately 7,000,000 pounds. In this particular case we find that they have purchased enough sausage during the past 3 months to last the entire year at a time when the market prices were at an all-time high.

Government purchases of beef for the past 3 months have totaled more than 114,000,000 pounds against their estimated requirements of less than 70,000,000. Of beef alone during the past 3 months we find that they have purchased 44,000,000 pounds more than they even claimed to need. During the past 3 months we have had a situation where the Government monopolized the markets, taking all offers and forcing prices to an all-time high and leaving the housewife with very little meat, and that obtainable only at prohibitive prices.

On the other side of the picture we have witnessed during the past 2 months extremely low prices on poultry, both chickens and turkeys. The producers of both these commodities have been forced to sell their products below the cost of production. What has been the practice of the Government buyers in this department? During the months of October, November, and December of last year, a period when poultry was selling at the highest prices on record and at a time when Government officials were again loudly proclaiming their sympathy for the consumers and shouting charges against the Republican Party for wrecking price controls on poultry, we find that the Government purchases were listed as: October, 30,300,000 pounds; November, 11,900,000 pounds; December, 8,719,000 pounds. This is a grand total of more than 50,000,000 pounds purchased during this period when poultry was selling at the highest prices on record. During January the market prices of poultry, both chickens and turkeys, dropped below the cost of production. Actually they dropped to less than one-half the previous top levels, and we find that during this period the Government purchases were as follows: January, 29,000 pounds; February, 600,000 pounds, or a total or 629,000 pounds purchased during the 2-month period when poultry was selling considerably below the cost of production and compares with a total of more than 50,000,000 pounds purchased during the preceding 3-month period when poultry prices were at the highest on record. This actually represents less than 2 percent of the purchases for the preceding 3 months.

Mr. President, the result of this haphazard method of buying has been not only the wasting of enormous sums of the taxpayer's money, but the complete demoralization of the commodity markets of our Nation. Our great poultry and dairy industries in the East are threatened with ruin unless we call a halt to this procedure.

In view of the confusion in public thinking upon this question, in view of the charges by even some members of our representative bodies that this situation results from abandonment of OPA, and in view of the facts which I have presented today, placing the responsibility where it should rest, namely, upon the Government procurement officials, I urge that the appropriate committee of the Senate, take note of these facts and order an investigation.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah obtained the floor.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Jenner	Pepper
Bricker	Johnston, S.C.	Robertson, Va.
Cain	Kilgore	Russell
Cooper	Knowland	Smith
Cordon	Lodge	Sparkman
Donnell	Lucas	Taft
Dworshak	McCarran	Taylor
Ellender	McCarthy	Thomas, Utah
Ferguson	McClellan	Thye
Flanders	McFarland	Umstead
Fulbright	McMahon	Vandenberg
Green	Maybank	Watkins
Hatch	Moore	Wherry
Hawkes	Morse	White
Hill	Murray	Wiley
Holland	Myers	Williams
Ives	O'Conor	Young

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], I shall vote in favor of the amendment which will be offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH]. In making this announcement, I wish it to be understood, first of all, that my argument will not be against a given amendment or in favor of a given amendment, but will be along the line that in view of the course which has been pursued in this matter, we probably should continue upon it.

Mr. President, I do not like the spirit of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, insofar as its wording is concerned. I am against what it attempts to accomplish, for the same reason that during the Seventy-ninth Congress and the Seventy-eighth Congress, I opposed all bills in which attempt was made to relieve employers or other persons of responsibility for their acts simply because they were following the judgment or ruling of an administrator. I think it is always bad law, although I am not going to talk about law as such, it is surely contrary to the scheme of our governmental processes, to relieve anyone of responsibility for acts which he has taken an oath to perform honestly and in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

I think the amendment itself belittles the administrator and belittles the way in which our country carries on. I believe we should, as the Constitution suggests, give full faith and credit to the various branches of our Government. I have said that I am not going to talk about law or about constitutional aspects of the pending bill or the pending amendment. They have been so ably covered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] that I feel myself weak indeed in following in their footsteps even to talk upon another subject.

However, Mr. President, I do wish to discuss our Constitution and our constitutional scheme of government.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. My only purpose in rising is to say that the Senator from Utah is making a very important address, one which should be considered by Senators. I do not know why it is necessary for the Senate to continue in session at night if only a few Senators remain here.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. TAFT. A point of order, Mr. President. No business has been conducted since the last roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; no business has been conducted.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HATCH. When a point of order is made and ruled on, business has been conducted, has it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HATCH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

During the calling of the roll,

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that no Senator can answer his name until his name is called. I am trying to keep a record of who is answering the quorum call, and I do not want Senators to march up to the desk and answer to their names until their names are called, a second time, if necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order, and Senators will take their seats. Senators desiring to converse will retire to the cloakroom. The clerk will continue the roll call.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the calling of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hawkes	O'Conor
Baldwin	Hill	Pepper
Bricker	Holland	Robertson, Va.
Brooks	Ives	Russell
Byrd	Jennner	Smith
Cain	Johnston, S.C.	Sparkman
Chavez	Kilgore	Taft
Cooper	Knowland	Taylor
Cordon	Lodge	Thomas, Utah
Donnell	Lucas	Thye
Downey	McCarran	Umstead
Dworshak	McCarthy	Vandenberg
Ferguson	McFarland	Wherry
Flanders	Maybank	White
Fulbright	Moore	Wiley
Green	Morse	Williams
Hatch	Murray	Young

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I kept a careful record of both quorum calls. On the first quorum call, when 51 Senators were present, 27 Democrats and 24 Republicans responded. I kept a pencil check of every Senator who answered to his name during the second roll call, and 18 Democrats and 13 Republicans answered when their names were called by the clerk. I do not know where the other 20 names on the second quorum call came from. I listened to every name called and noted who responded, and I respectfully submit that 51 Senators did not answer.

Mr. President, here we have a night session, and apparently the Republicans expect the Democrats to furnish a majority to keep a quorum present. Even on the first roll call of 51 there were more Democrats present tonight than there were Republicans, and yet the Republicans have the majority. Is this another one of those evenings when somebody in the majority is having a reception downtown, such as occurred a few days ago when we had an hour and a half of confusion in an evening session before a certain group of 8 or 10 Republican Senators could return to the Chamber in order to vote upon a very important measure? If we are going to have night sessions, it seems to me that the majority party ought to have the requisite number here for a quorum. The Democrats, as is shown by the roll calls, are more than willing to cooperate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator from Illinois raising a point of order? The rule of the Senate is very clear. Rule V, paragraph 2, states:

> If, at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate.

The clerk of the Senate, under the direction of the Presiding Officer, called the roll. The roll was presented to the Presiding Officer. The roll shows that a majority of the Senators are present in the Chamber and have answered to their names. The Presiding Officer announced the result, namely, that, 51 Senators having answered to their names, a quorum was present. That is not subject to debate. The Chair then recognized the Senator from Utah.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Utah yielded to me to make an observation. I do not care what the second roll shows, Mr. President, with respect to 51 Senators being present. The Senator from Illinois sat here and listened to every name when it was called and the responses as they were made, and he did not make any mistake about it. Only 31 Senators answered to their names on the last call. Whether the Senators walked to the desk and had their names put on the roll, I do not know; it is against the rule if they did; and I called attention to it.

The Senator from Ohio made it plain a week ago that we were to have a night session tonight, and he was justified in so doing. We have important legislation to pass, and Senators ought to be here. There ought to be a sufficient number of Senators present at least to constitute a quorum. I point out again that on both roll calls the Democrats have furnished the majority, and I still say that on the last roll call there were not 51 Senators who answered to their names.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will observe that there can only be one clerk of the Senate at a time.

Mr. LUCAS. That is all right, but a Senator has the right to keep the record straight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk of the Senate called the roll. The Chair is satisfied that he recorded the roll call accurately, and the Chair also was observing the roll call at the time. A quorum of the Senate is present for business.

Mr. LUCAS. The Chair can state that there can only be one clerk of the Senate, and I agree with that; but the Senator from Illinois was not incorrect in making his estimate. The Senator from Illinois was not in error by 20 Members, and so asserts, notwithstanding what the Chair says, notwithstanding the accuracy of the Chair's count, notwithstanding what the clerk said.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a very brief observation. I do not challenge the accuracy of the count which was made by the clerk, because I did not keep count as the roll was called, and my experience in the past has been that the clerk is generally correct. I do think, however, that it is most unusual, considering the great drive which is being made to expedite the pending legislation, to have members of the minority furnish the greater part of the attendance at the evening sessions. It was very noticeable the other evening when we had a night session that there were more Democrats present and in their seats during most of the evening than there were Republicans. The same condition obtains tonight. I wonder if this is evidence of the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Ohio that the Democrats consumed all the time in delaying the business of the Senate. The minority furnishes more Senators here for the evening session than are furnished by the majority party.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I shall be glad to yield, Mr. President, with this observation, that I am really and truly not delaying the deliberations of the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I have only this to say: This evening session was announced more than a week in advance. It is really absolutely essential that the Senate be in session every possible moment in order to complete the business which should be completed before the first of April. I regret as much as any other Senator that all Senators have not been in attendance today. I think the RECORD will show that there are more Republicans than Democrats present, but I am just as critical of the Republicans who are not present as I am of the Democrats. The transaction of the business of the Senate is as much the responsibility of the Democrats as it is of the Republicans, and I see no particular reason to raise the question as to how many of each party are absent. Before the first of April it is necessary to complete several bills, including those extending controls over sugar, rubber, and various other articles to meet the expiration of the Second War Powers Act. We have to meet the President's request for loans to Greece and Turkey, which legislation is supposed to be enacted by the first of April. We have on the Executive Calendar of the Senate the Lilienthal nomination which is pressed upon us as something to be immediately disposed of. I feel that it is the duty of all Senators, Republicans as well as Democrats, to remain in the Senate tonight and enable us to proceed. There are a number of Senators who wish to be heard on the pending bill. It is probable that we may not reach a vote tonight except on one amendment to the bill; yet the bill should be discussed.

I quite agree with my colleague, the Senator from Georgia, that with respect to this particular bill the Republicans have taken more time than have the Democrats. The Democrats now have the time freely to discuss the bill, and certainly I am not disposed to hurry them. I would not even have pressed a night session upon the Senate except that we have to have such sessions at some time, and it was understood that we would have such a session tonight. I assume that Senators on both sides have made their arrangements for tonight. So I appeal for the cooperation of all Senators to proceed and discuss the subject before the Senate. I hope we may make such substantial progress that at least we may perhaps be able to vote tomorrow.

Mr. HATCH, Mr. LUCAS, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HATCH. What is the pending amendment, and may it be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] as a substitute for certain language commencing on page 20, line 20.

The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I desire to make one further observation. Mr. President, I want the Senate to know that I agree 100 percent with the Senator from Ohio in the statement he last made. There is tremendously important business which the Senate of the United States must dispose of within the next 30 days. I am in favor of this night session. I am in favor of further night sessions in order to further expedite action on imperative legistion soon to be on the calendar.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LUCAS. Just one moment please. I have not concluded. Mr. President, while I agree with the Senator from Ohio with respect to the transacting of business in the Senate, it is worth while to call attention again to the fact that while we are all responsible for this program, nevertheless the majority has the responsibility for carrying it through, and I thought it perfectly proper to call attention to the two roll calls which were had tonight, and to have it known how many Democrats were present and how many Republicans were present.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I wish to ask the distinguished Senator from Illinois a question. In the Senator's recapitulation of the number of Senators present, how many Republicans did he say were present and how many Democrats?

Mr. LUCAS. To which roll call is the Senator referring?

Mr. WHERRY. I am talking about the first roll call.

Mr. LUCAS. What about the last one?

Mr. WHERRY. I am talking about the quorum call now.

Mr. LUCAS. There were two quorum calls.

Mr. WHERRY. I want the RECORD to show that 28 Republicans answered "present" to the quorum call, and 23 Democrats answered "present." I shall be glad to read the names of the Senators who answered "present," and produce them also if the Senator wants me to do so, so he may see them.

Mr. LUCAS. Was the Senator from Nebraska present when the roll was being called, and did he take down the names of Senators as they answered?

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator from Nebraska has been on the floor all day. The Senator from Nebraska was in the Senate Chamber when the roll was called.

Mr. LUCAS. Did the Senator keep a record of the Senators as they answered to their names?

Mr. WHERRY. I checked with the clerk, and I have checked with those present, and I find that 28 Republicans answered to their names when the roll was called.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggestion of the absence of a quorum is not in order.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, in view of the fact that business has been transacted since the last call of the roll, I ask if it is not in order to suggest the absence of a quorum. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is not in order.

The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. MAYBANK. I suggest to the Presiding Officer that the rule provides that when business has been transacted by the Senate the suggestion of the absence of a quorum is in order; that when business has not been transacted such a suggestion is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no transaction of business since the last call of the roll, and the Senator from Utah has not yielded for that purpose.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no business transacted by the Senate in the period intervening since the last call of the roll. If the Senator wishes to appeal from the ruling of the Chair he is privileged to do so.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I do not appeal from the ruling of the Chair, but I contend that business was transacted since the last call of the roll. The Presiding Officer has made a ruling on my suggestion of the absence of a quorum. I ask if that is not the transaction of business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no business transacted by the Senate of the United States since the last call of the roll. The decision of the Chair was not business of the Senate.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I appeal from the decision of the Chair and ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. MAYBANK. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the decision of the Chair is sustained.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is too late.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] has the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I do not want to be technical; I want to raise no question; but I am deeply impressed, as I am sure all other Senators are, at the inadvisability of trying to force night sessions and trying to force decisions.

Mr. President, I said earlier in the evening the Senator from Utah has an important address to deliver. The Senator from Utah has probably given as much study, as much thought, and as much consideration to labor legislation as has any other Member of the Senate. My only thought is that he might have a respectable audience of Senators who are interested in this question who might listen and who, I hope, might learn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will observe that apparently there are more Senators present at this time to listen to the Senator from Utah than were present at times during the day when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] were speaking. Apparently the Senator from Utah has an excellent audience.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HATCH. I think it is perfectly apparent that, when the point of no quorum was made and an appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair, business was transacted, and that a point of no quorum is now in order. I shall not make the point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield for that purpose?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senator from New Mexico stated that he would not make the point.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BALDWIN. I have been trying to obtain the floor to ask whether the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from New Mexico have had their dinner. It seems to me that it is possible some Senators may be absent at dinner. I understood when night sessions were planned that it was contemplated that there would be a recess for dinner.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I am one of those Senators who went to dinner. I came in 3 or 4 minutes late, but I am now here and ready to listen to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. In reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, let me say that we have tried several types of procedure. We tried recessing for dinner, and apparently that did not work. Very few Senators returned after dinner. Tonight we have followed the idea of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] to continue in session without a recess for dinner, which I thought was a good idea. So whether we go through without a recess or whether we take a recess for dinner, there are still complaints.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HATCH. Would a point of no quorum now be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Utah were to yield for that purpose, it would be in order at this time, but the Senator from Utah has spoken once, and now being in his second speech, he would be yielding the floor at the same time.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, if there is any attempt, or threat, or suggestion with respect to taking the Senator from Utah from the floor some of the others of us will occupy the floor until 10 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer was merely observing, for the protection of the Senator from Utah, that the rules of the Senate would permit the point of order of no quorum to be made.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield for that purpose?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I do not wish to yield for the purpose of losing the floor. Therefore, I decline to yield for the purpose of a quorum call.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if I were to make the point of no quorum, would the Senator from Utah lose the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The parliamentary situation is that the Senator from Utah had started to speak, and the absence of a quorum was suggested, and a quorum call was ordered. The Senator is now making his second speech on the same legislative day. The Presiding Officer was merely pointing out that if the point of order should be made it might take the Senator from the floor if he should yield for the purpose of another quorum call.

Mr. MYERS. The Chair stated that it might take him from the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If a point of order were made, under the rules of the Senate that would be the effect.

Mr. MYERS. I am asking the specific question, If the Senator from Utah should yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum, would he be taken from the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to answer that question until the point of order is made. If the point of order is made, the Chair will rule on the point of order at that time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I decline to yield for that purpose, Mr. President.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. What is the rule, when a quorum call is ordered, with respect to Senators answering to their names? Under a strict interpretation of the rule, may a Senator be recorded as present without answering the quorum call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Presumably a Senator must be present to answer the quorum call in order to be recorded as present. However, the practice in the Senate this evening is no different from the practice which has been followed by the Senate for many years.

Mr. LUCAS. I understand that; but frequently we must strictly observe the rules of the Senate in order to keep the parliamentary situation straight. As I understand, it is necessary for a Senator to be actually present and answer to his name when the quorum call is made, in order to be recorded as present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is correct. Under a strict interpretation of the rules, when a quorum call is ordered Senators should answer to their names as they are called. If they do not answer at the time their names are called, they may answer at the conclusion of the roll call, before the result is announced.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I thank the Senator for yielding to me for a very brief observation. Senators on both sides of the aisle are trying to make time, but they are trying to make time by delay. I wish we could use a little common sense and propriety and allow the Senator from Utah to proceed, without worrying about anything else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I thank my colleagues for giving me this lesson in parliamentary procedure. I appreciate it. I thank the Presiding Officer for calling attention to the fact that more Senators are present enjoying the dissertation on parliamentary procedure than are usually present when a Senator is making a speech. I trust that after I have been speaking for 5 minutes the Chair will not call the attention of Senators and occupants of the galleries to the number of Senators who remain. That would be embarrassing indeed. But I assure the Presiding Officer that I shall not take offense if I look around and see my usual audience in the United States Senate when I am occupying the floor. I hope that for once I can go home and say that there were few Senators present because it was a night session. That would be the first time since I came to the Senate that I would be able to make that sort of excuse.

If I may now try to gather my wits together and say what I started to say, I believe that we should make plain to the people of the country exactly what the United States Senate is attempting to do in dealing with the pending portal-to-portal legislation. When I say that, Mr. President, I do not reflect upon anyone—especially I do not reflect upon the zealous work done by the Committee on the Judiciary in conducting hearings, moving forward with a report, then withdrawing the report, and bringing in another. The majority report and the minority views are both before us. I am sure that both reports have been written in an attempt to accomplish the best possible result.

But in spite of that, I think it is extremely unwise for any branch of the Government of the United States to attempt to take jurisdiction of the actions of another branch. The genius of the American Government, under the theory of separation of powers and balance of powers, does not rest upon the rights which are granted as the result of a written Constitution. The genius of our Government preserves itself because of the complete fair play and the equality granted each branch of the Government.

Mr. President, our Government fails whenever the Congress of the United States attempts to interfere with the discretion of the President of the United States. Congress can instruct and authorize, but it cannot order. It is assumed that the President will act within his discretion. Congress can point out that it would be unwise to veto a certain bill, and the President, if he vetoes it, must recognize the fact that he vetoes it with a proper understanding of the facts and in accordance with the Constitution. The President of the United States cannot say, "Congress may go so far and no farther." He cannot order it. That would destroy the scheme of democratic processes and that which we are trying to do, which is to operate government by common consent.

Whenever the Congress of the United States steps in and tries to retard the processes of justice, whenever it undertakes to deprive of his rights a petitioner who, whether worthily or unworthily, has taken his rights before the courts, it is simply playing out of bounds and attempting to destroy the genius of our American constitutional system.

We have had stormy affairs in the history of the United States which had to do with the executive, the legislative, and the judicial branches of the Government. I can trust the courts of the United States to handle cases which come before them, and I can especially trust the Supreme Court of the United States, because very seldom in our history has that Court played out of bounds. It has been partisan, as has been charged in some of the dissenting opinions; it has attempted to prevail and to force upon the country a certain economic theory; it probably has at times been political, even in face of the fact that the Court always says that it will not decide a political question; but the 150 years of experience of our country has demonstrated that the genius of our Government is based upon strength, that common consent is not weak, and that our Government is not held together by the bonds of a written Constitution, but by the willingness of the people to play fair.

Before the courts of the United States there are pending hundreds of cases, and because the courts seem to be burdened, it is suggested that the cases involving portal-to-portal pay be wiped out. Let us carry through the implication arising from the introduction of a bill to stop portal-to-portal cases. What does it mean? It means that if Congress enacts this bill into law it does not trust the courts of the land to decide cases in accordance with law, justice, and good, sound reason. That is the only way it can be interpreted.

We have before the Congress at this time two bills, designed to operate in two great spheres. One is labeled the portal-to-portal bill, and the other deals with the administration of railroads. It is suggested that Congress act quickly in order that sides may be taken and in order that courts may be prevented from acting in accordance with the law of the land.

Mr. President, I say that is unwise and unfair procedure which, if it is followed very often, will destroy the essence of the American political system, because if we are to maintain three coordinate branches of government their respective fields must not be encroached upon. We cannot allow one to usurp the functions of the other. When that happens the American system begins to disintegrate. That is one reason why there was opposition a while ago when the President of the United States seemed to be offering too many suggestions to Congress. The American Government might be destroyed if the President ordered the Congress around. We now realize that there was not any ordering on his part. No one was coerced; no one was forced; never once did Congress act outside of its right. When the time came to say "No" to the President's suggestion, Congress rose up and said it in no uncertain terms, and the people of the United States supported Congress in that regard.

At another time when it was suggested that perhaps something should be done about the Supreme Court, the people of our country rose up and objected, and no action was taken.

That is the history of our land, Mr. President. There is a case before the courts, the John L. Lewis coal case, which has been decided in an orderly way through orderly procedure. Were not the judgments sound? Were they of such a character as to command support? Were they not in keeping with the best theories regarding the way in which we should proceed in keeping peace among ourselves and taking care of each others' rights?

Mr. President, I think it would be very unwise to do what is being attempted. It would be not only unwise but in the light of history, almost completely unfair, when we realize the attacks which have been made and are being made upon the labor policy of the United States, which policy was inaugurated by a Democratic administration.

The first people whose rights will be denied are the weakest element in the labor field of the whole United States. A portal-to-portal bill is not directed against organized labor; it is not directed against the great and powerful among organized labor. It is not directed against the highly paid—probably overpaid—who have gained advantages because of their power. The first act of reform, the first attempt to undo that which has been done by those who have been termed "New Deal legislators" and "New Deal administrators" takes the form of a bill aimed at poor people who cannot take care of themselves, workers who are earning 25, 30, and 40 cents an hour, those who are not organized and who cannot bring cases to justify their small pay.

Mr. President, under the circumstances, even if I were not opposed to that which Congress is attempting to do, I would be a bit ashamed to take that sort of stand at this time. Let us hit where we ought to hit. Let us be brave, as some have said. Let us knock down the great dictators among labor, if there are any. I have not found any. I have found labor leaders attempting to keep consistently in harmony with those whom they lead, exactly as every other leader attempts to do.

Mr. President, there is something closely akin to morale, even in labor organizations. If morale is the basis of success in the military field, I am sure it is the basis of success in the labor field. Leadership can come only through holding, keeping, and being worthy of that leadership. Mr. President, under the American system there is no way for a dictator to rise and drive those he is supposed to lead. It simply cannot be done; it is not being done, and it will not be done.

Mr. President, the Wages and Hours Act—otherwise known as the Fair Labor Standards Act—was built upon a new philosophy, namely, that the Federal Government has a right to do something for the general welfare by attempting to raise the standards of labor. That philosophy was questioned. There is no doubt that the lawyers who appeared before us and told us that the Fair Labor Standards Act was unconstitutional were the same ones who carried the case to the Supreme Court of the United States and there attempted to prove it unconstitutional.

However, Mr. President, we must realize what was done at that time and the fight which was made and the efforts which were made in making the National Labor Relations Act and the Fair Labor Standards Act part of the law of our land. In connection with one of them, 68 or 69 of the greatest constitutional lawyers of the United States advised their clients not to obey the law, because they said it was unconstitutional. In attempting to break down that law, a most interesting maneuver in the way of appealing to our courts was indulged in. I refer to the maneuver of bringing test suits in every district court of the United States, so that the agency representing the National Labor Relations Act had to answer all those suits. That was done instead of following the ordinary practice of finding a case which both sides would permit to go through the ordinary judicial and legal processes, and thus determine the constitutionality of the law.

Mr. President, now an attempt is made, in a similar way, to stop the ordinary judicial process. But the judicial process was not stopped even by the scheme I have just referred to, for the Government answered each of those suits. Each was considered and pleaded, and each one went through the judicial process. In the end the Supreme Court of the United States—at that time it was not the so-called reformed court—declared the act constitutional; and the same thing occurred with respect to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. President, the bill now pending is the first attempt since then to undermine the law which brought about such a drastic improvement in our industry-labor relations and in our constitutional theory regarding labor legislation. If the attempt is carried to a successful conclusion, it may be necessary for us to do over again all that has been done in the last 10 or 12 years in the way of labor legislation, and it may be necessary for us to attempt to restore to the people their rights.

Therefore, Mr. President, I plead with all my might and main for the Senate to consider this matter carefully, not to act hastily, not to pass quickly a bill which should not be passed, not to take action which will be regretted. Let us insist that the true story be told and that the actual situation be made clear. Then if we find that what has been done is unacceptable, let us oppose it, and oppose it honestly; let us admit, if we choose to do so, that the theory of labor law represented by the Fair Labor Standards Act and the National Labor Relations Act is a step backward and should be done away with. Let us not nibble at that theory, but let us face the issue squarely. To those who are attempting to make ineffective the great gains which were made by those acts I suggest that they fight out the battle upon the lines of bad law and bad constitutional procedure, if they regard it as such; but I say they should not attempt to nibble here and nibble there and thus accomplish their purpose by indirection.

Mr. President, sometimes in choosing the names by which laws are known, we disregard the objectives they have attained. For instance, we speak of the Walsh-Healey Act, the Bacon-Davis Act, the Wagner Act, and so forth. In this instance I am proud that although for a time the Fair Labor Standards Act was called the Thomas-Norton Act, and although our names are entitled to be associated with that act, nevertheless that act is generally known by a name which is indicative of the good it has done for the common people of the United States. I should prefer to have all of them know exactly what that act stands for, rather than to have it honor the one or two persons whose names might be connected with it. The people of the United States know that by means of the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act, definite steps were taken in their behalf in regard to the theory of our Government dealing with hours of labor and pay. Every girl and boy in the United States who had been caught by the former child-labor practices realized that something had happened which improved their laboring conditions. What happened was healthy for each community and for the entire country. We can begin to comprehend what so many of the under-privileged people of America were being paid for their labor when we remember the struggle which occurred in connection with the enactment of the first act, which called for a minimum wage of 25 cents an hour. At that time many persons were working for 10 cents an hour, and in some cases even less. But after that act was passed and went into effect, all those people knew that something had been done for them.

There was also the great mass of white collar workers, from one end of the United States to the other—people who had been forgotten, and who always are forgotten, because their relationships are merely those of the employee to the boss. They were not organized, and no attempt was made to organize them. That mass of 20,000,000 forgotten persons—and especially during the wartime were they forgotten—knew that something was being done for them, and they appreciated what was being done. How will they feel about this nibbling away, this destruction, this taking away of rights, this attempt to break down what has been gained for them?

Mr. President, the proponents of this measure can argue from now until doomsday that they are merely seeking to protect the employer from unjust suits which might be brought in connection with portal-to-portal pay, but they will never convince anyone of that, because the people will know who are behind the efforts to have the Congress pass the bill.

Who is behind them? Do we not find the same witnesses, the same effort, the same lobbyists who were against the Wages and Hours Act and against the National Labor Relations Act now coming forward? Do we not find the same people now pleading, "Please take care of us and protect us if we act in harmony with a rule or regulation prescribed by an administrator even though the rule or regulation may be erroneous?" Was not that the theory?

Mr. President, sometimes even great nations need guardian angels, and I think this is the time when we need one, because the leadership of our country today is headed right toward action which will hurt the little fellow, and that is not fair.

Mr. President, what about the Fair Labor Standards Act? How did it become law? Did it happen overnight? Was it a hastily drawn act? No; it was introduced in more than one Congress. It had a hard time being born. Finally the forces of reaction lined up in such a way that we would not get a conference together without bringing about a change in the ordinary procedure of arranging conferences in the Senate. When the conference met did it hastily act on something? No. Senator Borah, of Idaho, who was dean of the Senate at that time, told us that in his whole experience of over 30 years in the Senate he had never seen anything like what happened in that conference—a fight day after day for what was right.

Did those who fought for the Fair Labor Standards Act have the support of all labor? Yes, the moral support. But, as was pointed out by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] today, organized labor had already accomplished all that the act could give them, and therefore we did not have the type of support which we ordinarily have for labor legislation. The act had to be passed by men who were humanitarian-minded, if I may use that term, men who accepted the theory that it is possible by legislative act to make better the lot of the people of our country, men who knew that a little more play and a little bit less work would bring happiness and contentment to the people.

Mr. President, we are told that the pending bill is not aimed at the Fair Labor Standards Act. It would be hard for me to believe that. After listening to the eloquent arguments presented this afternoon by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH], two great lawyers, who discussed the bill in a manner in which I am not prepared to debate it and who covered a field into which I would not dare to venture, we know from what they said that the enactment of the bill would almost destroy the effectiveness of three of the greatest labor laws which are on our statute books today.

Mr. President, if the Senate is merely trying to correct an evil, if it is merely trying to say, "These portal-to-portal cases are unfair, and therefore they should be stopped," does it take 21 pages of the most legalistic wording to say that much? If the proponents of the bill wanted to retain the Walsh-Healey Act and the Davis-Bacon Act, the Prevailing Wage Act, and the act against the kickback, if they wanted to make sure that the portal-to-portal pay practice would not extend to those acts, under which no such case has as yet been brought, why did they not say that practice shall not be indulged, instead of presenting a lengthy measure running into paragraphs, to protect two acts under which no cases have been brought at all.

Mr. President, 21 pages of legalistic phraseology necessarily carry with them more definitions, more reasons for litigation, more argument, more chance for handing down decisions, and more confusion than possibly prevail today, because in each one of these cases, 1,900 of them as there are, the issue is plain-cut, it is straightforward, it is present. The Supreme Court of the United States interpreted language of the Fair Labor Standards Act which invited these cases. That is all that has to be argued. But when once we put into effect 21 pages of legalistic expressions, we are going to bring about argument of every one of the sentences in those 21 pages, and there will be talk about many other things besides portal-to-portal pay before the end is reached.

Mr. President, whenever a government which is founded upon the theory of law slips into the field of litigation there is no end to argument and there is no end to legal procedure. In my opinion we are inviting such a situation as that.

But let us get back to the Fair Labor Standards Act, and see how it came into existence. It has not been 10 years since it was enacted, but it is easy to forget. Things are soon forgotten. It took so long to pass a fair labor standards act that I have heard more than one Senator given credit for being father of the idea. With the introduction of the first bill we attempted to hold joint hearings between the House of Representatives and the Senate. That was one of the experiments we tried. It did not work any better than night sessions work, because that is not the way the Congress of the United States has usually worked. We did not make very much progress, and we did not pass a bill.

The interesting feature was the opposition to the bill. First it was claimed that it interfered with States' rights. Second, it was said, "You have to have railway regulation before you can have fair labor standards. You have to remember the West, you have to remember the South, you have to remember the East, and here the Government is trying to do something it cannot possibly do. You are going to hurt somebody."

Note how gravely we are hurting somebody. We put the minimum wage at 25 cents an hour, and the minimum work week at 44 hours. Yet there was opposition, so much opposition that we could not touch domestic service, and we have not been able to touch it yet; we could not touch the agricultural field, and we have not been able to touch it yet. Much as that law was needed, much as we should have taken care of those who may be called the underdogs in labor, it was a hard struggle to do what we did.

Mr. President, have we been contented with what has been done? I do not say that the great Senator from Missouri is attempting to undermine the act, because I know he is not. He has been made chairman of a subcommittee, and he is trying to do a consistent piece of work, and is doing it well. But there has not been a session of Congress when there was not a bill introduced in an attempt to do away with the fundamentals of the Fair Labor Standards Act. All during the war we had to fight for the preservation of those standards because men rose either in the Senate or in the House and introduced bills with this sort of philosophy. They would not grant that the Fair Labor Standards Act was introduced for the purpose of raising standards. No; they accepted the philosophy of another bill which had nothing to do with fair labor standards, and they said it was introduced for the purpose of distributing work because there was a depression in the land, and work should have been divided up. They said, "Now, therefore, since war has come and labor is scarce, and we want everybody to work, let us remove all the prohibitions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and let everybody work in any way he wants to work, because we need laborers, we need production, we need to win the war. Do away with the standards and let the employer hire where he will, where he can, and pay what he can, but let us have production."

Mr. President, that is the history. It is a compliment to the Senate of the United States that not one of those destroying measures ever reached the floor of the Senate. But an effort was made to have them reach the floor of the Senate; and so the Senator from Utah, who had quite a bit to do with this act in the beginning of it, and who has had quite a bit to do with attempting to preserve it, insisted, whenever Executive orders in regard to labor were written during the wartime, no matter how scarce labor became, that such Executive orders should be written in accordance with the high standards we had gained as the result of legislation; and, all credit to the great Commander in Chief, the President of the United States, those Executive orders were written in accordance with the best labor standards which we had on the statute book. Never once did the Government, as such, attempt to destroy that which had been done. I wish I could say as much for a segment of industrial backers of various amendments, who have wanted to destroy it right from the very beginning.

Mr. President, let us be careful that we do not take a backward step. Let us see to it that nothing is done which will in any way destroy the progress made in the development and evolution of labor law, or interfere with our theory that under the Constitution the Government should and can safeguard and promote the general welfare of the people of the United States.

Mr. President, after reading the bill which the majority of the Judiciary Committee has reported, I feel it my duty to counsel the Senate against enacting an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act which would, in effect, seriously damage the act itself.

These so-called portal-to-portal suits, at which the Senate bill is directed, have caused a great deal of alarm and confusion in the industrial world, it is true. But let us not, in our desire to remedy that situation, enact other legislation which would create more confusion and more unrest. That is true, Mr. President. But let us not, in our desire to remedy that situation, enact other legislation which would create greater confusion and unrest. Let us not amend the Fair Labor Standards Act to the extent of merely leaving it on the statute books as only a reminder of fair-labor standards.

I was a Member of this body when we enacted wage-and-hour and child-labor standards which have come to be accepted by employers, employees, and the general public as a basic charter for the employment of young people and the working men and women of America, especially those in the lowest income groups. The Senate Committee on Education and Labor held extensive hearings. We brought in witness after witness whose testimony showed that one-third of our Nation was ill-clothed, ill-housed, and ill-fed. We heard the testimony of men and women in all walks of life, representing all sections of our society. I was chairman of the conference committee which agreed upon the final legislation. Now I know that there has been a great hue and cry for legislation dealing with these so-called portal-to-portal questions and I know the Judiciary Committee has tried to bring in legislation in response to that hue and cry. But I fear we are not giving due consideration to the potential effects of the proposed legislation on the statute itself. It seems to me that the hearings have been limited to those persons and parties with special interests in portal-to-portal questions. There is much more to this bill than past liabilities for portal-to-portal pay and I do not think the committee has heard a sufficient number of witnesses who have no special ax to grind. With only an exception or two, there were no witnesses who testified as to the effect of this proposed bill on the basic provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. There has been a lack of attention to the basic purposes of the statute. It is, therefore, my intention to discuss the origin of this legislation in the hope of bringing about a better understanding of the Fair Labor Standards Act itself and a better understanding of how the proposals of the committee will seriously cripple the act.

In 1937, President Roosevelt sent to Congress a message advocating Federal minimum wage and maximum hour legislation in which he discussed the need for such legislation and the objective of the Nation, in part, as follows:

> The time has arrived for us to take further action to extend the frontiers of social progress. * * * The overwhelming majority of our population earns its daily bread either in agriculture or industry. One-third of our population, the overwhelming majority of which is in agriculture or industry, is ill-nourished, ill-clad and ill-housed. * * *
>
> All but the helplessly reactionary will agree that to conserve our primary resources of manpower, Government must have some control over maximum hours, minimum wages, the evil of child labor, and the exploitation of unorganized labor.
> And so to protect the fundamental interests of free labor and a free people we propose that only goods which have been produced under conditions which meet the minimum standards of free labor shall be admitted to interstate commerce. Goods produced under conditions which do not meet the rudimentary standards of decency should be regarded as contraband and ought not to be allowed to pollute the channels of interstate commerce. * * *
> With the establishments of these rudimentary standards as a base we must seek to build up, through appropriate administrative machinery, minimum wage standards of fairness and reasonableness, industry by industry, having due regard to local and geographical diversities and to the effect of unfair labor conditions upon competition in interstate trade and upon the maintenance of industrial peace.

The Fair Labor Standards Act was passed on June 25, 1938. It became effective on October 24 of that year. It provided for a statutory minimum wage of 25 cents an hour for the first year and for 30 cents the next 6 years with provision to raise it to 40 cents an hour by October 24, 1945, or to 40 cents an hour as rapidly as possible before that date through the action of industry committees composed of representatives of management, labor, and the public.

It is significant to note that the 40-cent rate was achieved through such industry committee action in the summer of 1944, 17 months before the 40-cent statutory rate would have become effective.

Approximately 3,500,000 pay increases resulted from the minimum-wage provisions of the act. These increases went to almost 2,000,000 workers. I should like to point out to you that in discussing wage increases by imposition of the statute, that I mean wage increases up to 25 cents an hour in 1938, up to 30 cents an hour for the next 6 years except as the 40-cents-an-hour rate was reached by industry committee actions. The statute still stands at 40 cents an hour. That is the immense sum of $16 a week, and the portal-to-portal legislation may result in reducing even that amount. Certainly, there is not one in a thousand persons in this country, employer or employee, who would say that this 40-cent minimum has ever been high enough in light of the economic situations which have confronted us during the last 8 years.

In section 2 (a) of the Fair Labor Standards Act the finding and declaration of policy of the act was stated as follows:

> The Congress hereby finds that the existence, in industries engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, of labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers (1) causes commerce and the channels and the instrumentalities of commerce to be used to spread and perpetuate such labor conditions among the workers of the several States; (2) burdens commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce; (3) constitutes an unfair method of competition in commerce; (4) leads to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce; and (5) interferes with the orderly and fair marketing of goods in commerce.

As the Secretary of Labor stated in his annual report for the last fiscal year:

> The Fair Labor Standards Act, a twentieth-century economic charter for the wage earners of America, especially for those in the lowest income groups, will have been in effect 8 years on October 24, 1946. In those 8 years it has come of age; it has been accepted by workers as an instrument designed to guarantee a measure of security and as a means toward attainment of adequate, decent living standards, and by employers as a fair piece of legislation in the American tradition.

Since the act went into effect a little more than 8 years ago thousands of court opinions, including a number handed down by the Supreme Court, have been issued to clarify the meaning of the act. As a result the law is pretty well understood by the vast majority of all the 550,000 employers subject to its provisions. The law has become a stable force. I say this with full realization of the portal-to-portal question. I want to emphasize, however, that the uncertainty regarding portal-to-portal questions is only an exception to the general situation. The basic provisions of the act have been clarified for a number of years. The coverage of the statute is known except for certain unusual situations. In general, it is such fringe issues as portal-to-portal which have not been clarified.

In light of this relative stability of the law, I wonder if the Members of this body realize the considerable elements of uncertainty which would be injected into the picture by the proposed bill. I wonder if it is realized how much new litigation would result from the enactment of the committee bill. Under the proposed measure, the determintion of hours worked would depend upon the practice or custom in a given establishment or even in a given work place. Under the provisions of this bill hours worked would have to be determined with respect to particular employees at a given work place. It would not be possible, as it is under the act as it now stands, to lay down a general rule which would govern all similar situations. It would be necessary in each case under dispute to determine the law for that case. That would mean, in effect, that the facts in each single individual case would determine the law. That would mean litigation multiplied by more litigation until there would be so much litigation that the threat of 2,000 portal-to-portal suits would seem to be very small indeed. Just how much litigation would be required to clarify such questions, I do not know. I doubt if anyone knows. I would think, however, that it would require thousands of court cases to settle the innumerable disputes which would inevitably arise as to which activities have customarily been treated as working time activities.

I have indicated that one of the purposes of the Fair Labor Standards Act was to establish some uniform minimum standards of employment as to minimum wages, as to overtime, and as to child labor. The bill under consideration, H. R. 2157, in addition to wiping out liabilities for portal-to-portal questions in the past, would eliminate this uniformity under the act, at least as to the question of hours worked. The bill would in effect permit each employer to determine the application of the law with respect to the number of hours for which he would be required to compensate his employees. The framers of this bill no doubt sincerely believe that the employer's discretion would be restricted by strong collective bargaining agencies of the employees. Even if we should grant this contention, what about the 9,000,000 unorganized workers covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act?

Surely it cannot be contended that these 9,000,000 individual workers, with no collective bargaining powers, can bargain equally at arm's length with their employers. It may be true that during periods of relative labor scarcities, such as the present, the unscrupulous employer may not take advantage of the individual unorganized workers by asking them or requiring them to contribute a great deal more of their time in activities of various kinds without compensating for all of those compensable hours. When the Fair Labor Standards Act was passed there was no question that many employers not only could but had taken advantage of their employees, particularly those employees who belonged to no trade union. That is why I say that even in the present situation, when we are experiencing a period of relative labor scarcity, we must not consider this legislation as a temporary measure. Such legislation must be planned for periods of unemployment as well as for periods of employment.

Substantial periods of time devoted to work by the employee on behalf of his employer are at stake in this legislation. I use the word "work" very advisedly at this point, since I am confident that all Senators will agree with me that the activities performed by employees constitute work in the overwhelming majority of cases. Let me cite some concrete examples of the types of activities which in certain cases were not compensated for at the time the Fair Labor Standards Act was passed, but which were required to be paid for by the act.

In the garment industry, many workers were not paid for time spent in delivering finished work to jobbers' establishments, for cleaning and repairing machines, for making samples, or even for sweeping and cleaning shops. It would seem that under the proposed bill these activities would not have to be paid for since they precede or follow the so-called productive work. Under the proposed bill, the garment-industry employer would not have to pay even the minimum rate of 40 cents an hour specified in the act, if the employer were to require these activities to be performed prior to the beginning of productive time and established the practice of not considering it working time.

In the mining industry in my section of the country, for years before the wage-and-hour law came into being, and long before there were any cases with regard to portal-to-portal pay, portal to portal was a technique used by labor unions, and was included in the contracts. In one State the pay was higher than in another State, but in the State where the pay was lower the portal-to-portal allowance would be given. It is not a new idea that has grown out of the Fair Labor Standards Act. It is something that has been with us for a long time.

In the mining industry, before the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act, some employers failed to pay their workers for laying track, putting up mine props, and removing impediments. In the lumber industry some employers failed to pay workers for the time spent in taking the employer's teams to and from work, in harnessing and unharnessing them, and in feeding and grooming those teams. A Bureau of Labor Statistics study of logging operations in the southeastern lumber region revealed that 1 out of 10 employers failed to pay for such activities. The amount of time involved in some of these situations in the lumber industry amounted to as much as an hour to an hour and a half daily.

There are obviously thousands of different types of situations involved in this problem. Some of these—perhaps one or two that I have myself mentioned—may well be construed, eventually, as constituting compensable activities or working time. Some of the language on this point in the committee's report accompanying this bill suggests that this may be so with respect to some of these items. On the other hand, the language of the applicable provisions in the bill seems to me subject to interpretation in many ways. The wording of the bill is vague, and I do not see how this approach can really be made clear and precise. Much litigation extending over long periods may be necessary before the terms devised for this bill have been finally interpreted in the courts. Meanwhile standards with respect to working time would be enormously varied and those who wish to take advantage of the interpretation most favorable to themselves would hold a strong competitive weapon against employers who try to comply with the spirit of the basic act.

Even if the proportion of employers who would fail to pay for the many activities involved in this problem in the future should not be greater than the proportion of those who failed to pay in the past, we must still seriously concern ourselves with the effects of such differences in practice or custom on the competitive position of those employers who would pay for such activities. I doubt if many employers realize what the effects of this piece of legislation would be in regard to their competitive position. The cost to one employer, who would, by practice or custom, pay for certain activities, would, in many cases, be much greater than the cost to an employer who would establish certain practices or customs which would preclude compensation for similar activities. When these employers go into the open market to sell their products, the employer who, by his custom or practice paid the full labor bill, would be at the mercy of his competitor, who, by his custom and practice, decided not to pay for similar activities.

Mr. President, I must digress for a moment to point out the fact that one of the great problems we had to face in adopting the Fair Labor Standards Act was that of bringing about a uniform minimum for the whole country. This was objected to. Some sections contended that their whole economy rested upon the fact that they had cheap labor in great abundance. They wanted some sort of differential. It was because of the pressure of those areas where it was thought the economy depended upon cheap labor for the very economic existence of industry that the rate was made so low that no one could be hurt. But the minute we did that, in came other manufacturers saying that the rate must be uniform, that the only way to overcome the competition of the man who maintained low standards was to bring the standards of all up, and make them uniform.

Strange to relate—and yet not strange at all—it will be remembered that President Wilson opposed the establishment of a minimum wage. He said that he was opposed to the principle of the minimum wage because the tendency would naturally be for the minimum to become the maximum, and for employers to rely upon the minimum to hold their wages down rather than to use the minimum for the purpose of raising standards. The adoption of the Fair Labor Standards Act proved that President Wilson was ill-advised and that he did not understand how this system would work, because it did not work in the way he had anticipated. Everyone was glad that it did not work in that way. The minimum has become a real minimum, and not a maximum. But there was fear that if the standards of those sections which had plenty of cheap labor were not brought up to the standards of the rest of the country, they would have an advantage which would last so long that it would bring ill effects upon the rest of the country.

Mr. President, the portal-to-portal pay bill brings us back to the place where the very basis of a uniform minimum would be lost, because each community, and almost each work place, will be the judge of its own standards, after litigation.

In many situations the amount of time and thus the proportion of the wage bill with respect to which competing employers would maintain different standards would be large enough to constitute a crushing burden upon the employer who has been maintaining good standards and who is trying to continue maintaining fair labor standards for the future. Even in the instances in which the proportion of the wage earners' time and thus the proportion of the wage bill involved appears at first view to be small, it may still have a decisive effect in competition. With the possibility of a recession before us and, in any event, with the return of normal operation of supply and demand, the severity of competition experienced in many industries will again become manifest. Competitive industries, which do so much to bring about mass production and consumption of goods delivered to the market place at the lowest practicable prices, operate on small margins. The small amount that the employer who disregards fair labor standards with respect to the activities contemplated in the committee bill, may be able to save by so doing may well represent a major item in relation to the small margins prevailing in his industry. His advantage may thus be decisive, and he may drive out his competitor who by agreement or by practice maintains fair labor standards. In this way, even the situations involving a relatively small proportion of unpaid time for the wage earner may have drastic effects on the maintenance of the type of labor standards that the Fair Labor Standards Act seeks to achieve. It is obvious that where large proportions of unpaid time are involved in the activities to which the committee bill would apply, the effect on standards can be disastrous.

The Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted to establish fair competitive practices. The measure before us would eliminate the principle of fair competition.

Mr. President, one phrase which is used oftener than any other phrase in the political language of our country, especially by those on the other side of the aisle, is the phrase "free enterprise." Free enterprise implies competition. The theory of free enterprise rests upon the fine, old ideas of that great master of all thinkers, Adam Smith. He spoke of what is called the law of supply and demand, by which, if things are left alone, it is believed that they will seek what was thought 100 years ago to be their natural level.

Mr. President, I do not suppose that very many people in the United States know how difficult it is to define "free enterprise" and write it as a guaranty into law. I doubt very much whether many people in the United States know that such an attempt has been made, and that it was made by a group of Senators who believe in free enterprise, but who do not talk much about it. There is in the law itself a definition of what constitutes free enterprise.

It seems to me that we should sometimes refer to the law of the land in attempting to define that phrase, and not merely use a phrase which is meaningless, a phrase which describes some idealistic condition which never has existed, although we hope that some day it will exist. It is ethereal in its hope and in its aspiration. But there is a type of economic procedure which rests upon fundamental theories of good American practice, based upon certain laws of the land, such as the Fair Labor Standards Act, which lays down the principle of trying to protect those in our economic life who are in a weak condition.

Mr. President, when the Surplus Property Act was passed there was so much demand that surplus property be sold in such a way that it would protect our free enterprise that it was suggested, perhaps by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] who was one of the members of the committee on conference, that we try to write into the act an objective based upon the notion of free enterprise.

That it has never been read, never been discussed, and never been used as a definition is a great surprise to me, because I thought this collective effort on the part of a group of Senators who wanted the American economic system to be made a model in business affairs should become a part of the law and should be reduced to writing, if possible. I suppose everyone knows the law is in existence, but I do not think everyone knows that an attempt was made to define free enterprise. So I shall read into the record, the objectives of the Surplus Property Act, because, as I said before, I believe it contains the best definition I have ever seen of what constitutes in practice free enterprise in the United States, under our American economic system. It reads as follows:

The Congress hereby declares that the objectives of this act are to facilitate and regulate the orderly disposal of surplus property so as—

Here comes definition of "free enterprise." It is not mentioned, of course, but I think this is the first attempt to state the definition in one of our laws:

(a) to assure the most effective use of such property for war purposes and the common defense.

The property belongs to the people of the United States. It was bought for a purpose, and it should be used for that purpose, when it can be, by the people of the United States. That is a part of the free-enterprise system.

(b) to give maximum aid in the reestablishment of a peacetime economy of free independent private enterprise, the development of the maximum of independent operators in trade, industry, and agriculture, and to stimulate full employment.

Mr. President, the country has accepted the full-employment theory, as many other countries have, since the great declaration in Philadelphia in 1944. Here is something which was our first response to that declaration:

(c) to facilitate the transition of enterprises from wartime to peacetime production and of individuals from wartime to peacetime employment.

(d) to discharge monopolistic practices and to strengthen and preserve the competitive position of small business concerns in an economy of free enterprise.

That is made a basic objective of the law.

(e) to foster and to render more secure family-type farming as the traditional and desirable pattern of American agriculture;

(f) to afford returning veterans an opportunity to establish themselves as proprietors of agricultural, business, and professional enterprises;

(g) to encourage and foster postwar employment opportunities;

(h) to assure the sale of surplus property in such quantities and on such terms as will discourage disposal to speculators or for speculative purposes;

(i) to establish and develop foreign markets and promote mutually advantageous economic relations between the United States and other countries by the orderly disposition of surplus property in other countries;

(j) to avoid dislocations of the domestic economy and of international economic relations;

(k) to foster the wide distribution of surplus commodities to consumers at fair prices;

(l) to effect broad and equitable distribution of surplus property;

(m) to achieve the prompt and full utilization of surplus property at fair prices to the consumer through disposal at home and abroad with due regard for the protection of free markets and competitive prices from dislocation resulting from uncontrolled dumping;

(n) to utilize normal channels of trade and commerce to the extent consistent with efficient and economic distribution and the promotion of the general objectives of this act (without discriminating against the establishment of new enterprises);

(o) to promote production, employment of labor, and utilization of the productive capacity and the natural and agricultural resources of the country;

(p) to foster the development of new independent enterprise;

(q) to prevent insofar as possible unusual and excessive profits being made out of surplus property;

(r) to dispose of surplus property as promptly as feasible without fostering monopoly or restraint of trade, or unduly disturbing the economy, or encouraging hoarding of such property, and to facilitate prompt redistribution of such property to consumers;

(s) to dispose of surplus Government-owned transportation facilities and equipment in such manner as to promote an adequate and economical national transportation system and

(t) except as otherwise provided, to obtain for the Government, as nearly as possible, the fair value of surplus property upon its disposition.

Mr. President, I repeat that I have read that portion of the Surplus Property Act because I think it is well for us to define the terms we use. If we do so, I believe we shall find that in connection with this amendment if we attempt to destroy the competitive process we shall destroy, surely, free enterprise in the United States.

Therefore, Mr. President, the pending measure would eliminate the principle of fair and free competition; it would result in a break-down of standards, first in the unorganized establishments, and eventually in the organized establishments, for it would spread to them under competitive pressures by the small but powerful minority which would take advantage of every loophole provided by this measure. The rate at which that break-down would occur would be far more rapid than some persons might suppose. It would take place even if there were no business recession, and, of course, it would be greatly accelerated if an economic recession began. It must be remembered that every year some fifty thousand new enterprises start business, subject to the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Many thousands of these are in fields in which entry is relatively easy, but in which competition is savage. These thousands of new firms would be able to start at the lowest standards that their managements could impose upon their employees, because of the permission given in this bill for firms to be free of future liability if they establish practices under which they do not pay for many types of employee activities. Each year many thousands of new establishments would be added to the group undercutting the labor standards now maintained by long-established firms. There would be an ever-mounting pressure of the low standards against the fair standards. In labor standards, as in other things, the cheap currency would tend to drive out the good currency. The good work and hard work done in the past 8 years in establishing fair labor standards would be threatened, and might well be lost.

Another provision of this bill would, in my opinion, also have a crippling effect on the Fair Labor Standards Act. I refer to the provision for a 2-year statute of limitations to apply to employee suits. I should like to emphasize again that one of the purposes of the Fair Labor Standards Act was to place a floor under wages, so as to provide a more nearly adequate income for the lowest-paid workers. One of the purposes of section 16 (b) of the act was to insure the workers a means of obtaining the wages due them as a result of violations of the act by their employers. At the present time there is no statute of limitations in the act, and enforcement is governed by State statutes of limitation. These State statutes of limitation, governing Federal legislation, range from 1 to 12 years. In the last few years some States have lowered the periods for recovery under the act. None has raised the time limit for such suits. In discussing this problem in his annual report to Congress, the Administrator of the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Divisions of the Department of Labor recommended the enactment of a reasonable statute. With your permission, Mr. President, I should like to read pertinent paragraphs from the Administrator's report which was transmitted to the Senate on January 2:

Varying State standards give competitive advantages to violators in States with restrictive statutes of limitation and penalize many workers in the collection of wages legally due. Thus, the covered employee in Massachusetts has rights of recovery of unpaid wages under the act for a period of 6 years, the covered employee in North Carolina for a period of 3 years, and the covered employee in Alabama has this right for a period of only 1 year.

This lack of uniformity thwarts the purpose of the act to eliminate unfair competition resulting from substandard wages and hours from interstate commerce and the channels of interstate commerce. Moreover, the legal limitations set in some States threaten to undermine the rights of employees in need of the protection of the act (the low-paid, unorganized workers) by denying some of them the right to collect wages legally owed them, the minimum wages which the law guarantees them. Also, the undermining of the rights of these low-paid employees threatens to lower labor standards throughout the country. The passage of a reasonable staute of limitations to apply uniformly to all suits brought as a result of violations of the act would eliminate these evils.

Mr. President, the Administrator recommended in his annual report, and also before the Judiciary Committee, in connection with the now pending legislation, that the Congress enact a 3-year statute as the shortest period which would be fair to both employer and employee, and consistent with the present rights of employees and obligations of employers under the act.

In my opinion, a 2-year statute of limitations would be inadequate. As the Administrator stated in his annual report, there is inevitably a lapse of time in going through the preliminary motions of finding out whether there is a violation, and, if so, whether the employer is willing to adjust it without suit. In many cases, the employee would not have time to file a suit to collect the back wages legally due him, until 7 or 8 months had elapsed. So if we enacted a 2-year statute of limitations, the employee could collect his back wages for only 17 or 18 months. Let me emphasize that such wages would be legally owed and legally due. They have nothing to do with portal-to-portal questions. They may be due because of failure of an employer to pay the statutory minimum wage of only 40 cents an hour.

I wonder, Mr. President, whether we have considered this question from all angles. I wonder whether the proponents of this provision to limit to a 2-year period a worker's right to collect back wages illegally withheld from him are willing to enact legislation which would protect the worker from suits for longer than a 2-year period. The grocer, the butcher, the small-loan company can sue the worker for a period of from 5 to 6 years. Then why limit the worker to a period of 2 years for recovery of his wages—wages which are a debt of his employer. Again, let me point out that I am talking about wages due. There is no portal-to-portal issue here. It is simply a question of wages owed by an employer to his employee. Why limit such recovery to 2 years?

Mr. President, I have argued against a 2-year statute of limitations, for I regard it as inadequate for proper enforcement of the statute; I have contended that the measure under discussion would result in practically endless litigation, with resultant general unrest in the industrial world; and I have pointed out that this proposed legislation would eliminate the uniform minimum standards of employment as to minimum wages and overtime established by the Fair Labor Standards Act. Thus far, my arguments have been aimed against particular language in the pending bill.

Now I should like to direct my arguments into a more constructive channel. No one is more desirous of reaching a solution to these portal-to-portal questions than I am, but I am not willing to reach such a solution at the expense of hamstringing the future effectiveness of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Whatever we do we must not weaken the Fair Labor Standards Act itself. It is part of the lifeblood of our industrial economy. It is here to stay for the protection of workers and for the guarantee of fair competitive practices among employers. Rather than weaken such legislation, we must strengthen it. I will support any bill which would solve these portal-to-portal questions fairly, and which would at the same time strengthen the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. President, the only way under our governmental processes now in which we are afforded a chance to strengthen the act as it is, is through a test made in the courts, so that I find myself recurring in my argument to what I said in the beginning of my speech this evening.

One way we can strengthen the act, and forestall any such situation as that engendered by the so-called portal-to-portal question, is for the Congress to grant the Administrator power to issue authoritative interpretations of the act which employers can follow with the assurance that they cannot be sued retroactively in the event a court overrules the interpretations. As the Administrator pointed out in his testimony before the Judiciary Committee, there are many terms in the act which must be defined. It is not practicable to define all of these terms in statutory language. If the Senate should attempt such a task I am afraid we would be sitting in session for weeks upon weeks. Furthermore, it would be enormously difficult to develop satisfactory and uniform definitions. Such uniformity of definition of terms under the act is the proper work of an administrative agency charged with the responsibility of administering such legislation.

The Administrator has recommended that the Congress grant the power to issue such authoritative rulings subject to court review. He has gone further in his recommendations and asked the Congress to lay down broad standards for his guidance in issuing definitions or interpretations.

It is my opinion that if the Congress should grant the rule-making power to the Administrator, subject, of course, to the guidance of Congress and subject to court review, there would be no need whatever for such legislation as is proposed in the committee bill with regard to claims for future liability under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. President, in concluding my remarks I should like to urge again that this body review the basic purposes of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and that it consider seriously the effect of the proposed measure on that humanitarian piece of legislation. This is no time to cripple a worker's charter with amendments designed primarily for the benefit of employers.

As was said by the Senator from Rhode Island this afternoon, the Fair Labor Standards law was enacted for the benefit of the employees, it was enacted for the purpose of raising their standards of living, it was enacted for the purpose of raising their pay, or reducing their hours, giving them a start in a decent livelihood. Why should any Congress, after 8 years of progress along that line, make a mistake by retarding the growth and development which is taking place?

Instead of thinking in terms of amending the Fair Labor Standards Act downward with respect to the benefits accruing to workers, this body should think in terms of broadening the act by extending its coverage provisions to more low-paid workers who are within the commerce power of the Congress. It should think in terms of raising the hopelessly inadequate minimum wage.

When I say that, Mr. President, I remind the Senate that last year there was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor a bill to raise the minimum wage. The House and the Senate discussed that for some time, and actually adopted the idea, which showed that it was the proper time for increasing the minimum under law. Surely we do not want to go back on that act of just a year ago.

The Congress of 1938 pointed the way. The Congress of 1947 should take another step forward by raising the floor under the statutory minimum wage, by safeguarding the ceiling over hours, and bringing more workers under the protective roof of the act.

Mr. President, I said at the outset, and I repeat, that beginning with the Prevailing Wage Act in 1930 the Congress of the United States set itself on a new course in regard to industry-labor relations. With the act which did away with the ill and wicked use of the kick-back, and deceit on the part of contractors, it took another step.

With the establishment of the National Labor Relations Act, and the test of that act in the Supreme Court of the United States, we changed the theory of the commerce clause of the Constitution and the Federal Government moved into the sphere of industry-labor relations for the good of our country.

With the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 we started upon a new theory. That theory was tested by the highest court of the land, and the Court accepted the theory as being adequate and in accordance with the design and purposes of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, these steps have been taken in a progressive way, and a new labor-industry program has been laid down.

The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is considering more labor legislation, attempting to correct what are considered evils, but not attempting to move into a sphere to destroy the new rights which the last 10 years have given the people of our country. In the industry-labor conference of December 1941, immediately following Pearl Harbor, the people of the United States put themselves upon a higher plane than ever in regard to industry-labor relations. From that conference, made up of representatives of the Government, representatives of industry, and representatives of labor, there came a pledge and a promise, which in the main have been observed, and which have set new ideals and made for new practices.

That which was done in 1941 should have become the new constitution for future industry-labor relations. We have gone back on that, Mr. President. The industry-labor conference in the fall of 1945 failed primarily because we slipped back and attempted to do something contrary to or not wholly in keeping with the spirit of the agreement of 1941.

Mr. President, the question now faces the Senate, Are we going forward step by step with further evolution and further development, until we have in our country the industrial peace that everyone wants, the industrial understanding which takes care of those who are exploited, the industrial arrangement which gives every worker a chance for a half-way decent American life?

We have heard much of free enterprise, and I have gone to the trouble of reading the law of the land on that subject. Are we going to step back and not live up to the ideals which were expressed in the fall of 1944, when we passed the Surplus Property Act? Mr. President, that is the big question. Shall we go forward or shall we go backward? I for one am very proud of what has been accomplished in the last 10 years in our industry-labor relations, and say we shall go forward; and if the Senate attempts to destroy the gains that have been made for the underprivileged in our country, for the handicapped worker, for child labor, for those who have been exploited because of low wages, and overworked because of long hours, I say that if the Senate starts the trend back again, it will be repudiated by the people of this country in no uncertain terms the next time the people have a chance to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] as a substitute for certain language commencing on page 20, line 20.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I desire at this time to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska. The amendment which I offer is to insert in line 1 of his amendment quotation marks immediately preceding (d), and, second, by striking out, in said line 1, the words "liability nor." May I, Mr. President, briefly state the reasons for the proposed amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Would the Senator read the amendment as proposed to be amended?

Mr. DONNELL. I will ask that the clerk read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment as proposed to be amended.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The amendment, with the proposed modification, reads as follows:

On page 20, beginning in line 20, strike out all down to and including line 18 on page 21, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(d) Neither punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of this act, nor liability for an additional amount as liquidated damages under 16 (b) of this act, shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, prior to, on, or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling of the administrator in writing, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling, after such act or omission, is amended or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect.

"(2) No liability for an additional amount as liquidated or other damages under the Walsh-Healey Act shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, prior to, on, or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling of the Secretary of Labor or any Federal official utilized by him to assist in the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act, in writing, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling, after such act or omission is amended or rescinded, or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect."

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the reason for the insertion of quotation marks which I desire is that the language set forth in subdivision (d), beginning the words "neither liability nor punishment" is language to be inserted in the Fair Labor Standards Act. If the quotation marks were not inserted, the amendment would be an amendment to the Portal-to-Portal Pay Act of 1947. In order to make it clear that the contemplated amendment of subdivision (d) is an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, it is necessary that the quotation marks be inserted.

Mr. President, the reason for the motion to strike out of line 1 the words "liability nor," I shall endeavor to explain as briefly as possible. It will be recalled that this subdivision (d) relates to acts done or omitted in good faith in accordance with or in reliance on certain regulations, orders, interpretations, and so forth. It was my intention, as I shall note, from various references in the RECORD of yesterday, that subdivision (b) should provide in substance that neither criminal liability under section 15 or 16 (a) of the act, nor liability for an additional amount as liquidated damages under section 16 (b) of the act should be predicated on the acts done or omitted in good faith as recited further in the subsection (d).

My observations along that line I shall mention in a moment. This afternoon in the course of the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], I understand that he took the view that, as worded, subsection (d), in referring to "neither liability nor punishment" under section 15 or 16 (a) of the act, would be susceptible of the interpretation that it would virtually nullify the provisions of sections 6 and 7, and possibly other sections, of the Fair Labor Standards Act, due to the fact that section 15 makes it illegal to violate any of the provisions of section 6 or section 7, and of various other sections of the Fair Labor Standards Act mentioned in that portion of section 15.

Mr. President, on consideration of the point which I understand was in the mind of the Senator from Nevada, and by him expressed, I think there is at least an ambiguity in the language of the bill, in section 10, line 20, thereof, and consequently an identical ambiguity in the language appearing in line 1 of the so-called Wherry amendment. It will be observed that in line 1 of the Wherry amendment—which, by the way, is language which was not prepared by the Senator from Nebraska, but had been previously prepared by or on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary and was adopted by him in his amendment—it will be observed, I say, that the sentence begins as follows:

Neither liability nor punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of this act—

And so forth. Which would obviously lead to the very legitimate argument, and, in my judgment, probably the correct argument, that there is a distinction made between liability and punishment in that language. Thus, it might be well argued that subsection (d) appearing at lines 20 and following on page 20 of the bill might mean that liability independently of either liability for liquidated damages or liability for punishment of a criminal nature was being released from persons who acted in good faith on rulings of the Administrator.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, it had never been my intention that any such result should follow. My intention was solely that by the language in subsection (d) neither criminal liability under section 15 or 16 (a) of the act nor liability for an additional amount as liquidated damages under section 16 (b) of the act shall be predicated on an act done or omitted in good faith in accordance with the terms of said subsection (d).

I call attention, Mr. President, in this connection to the following language appearing at page 2184 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 18. I had addressed myself at this point to a new subsection to read as follows:

(d) Neither liability nor punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of this act—

I digress, Mr. President, to point out that that is the language which appears in line 20 of page 20 of the measure before the Senate and is a part of section 10. I then interpolated, after quoting that much of the language of that section, the following observation:

I interpolate that the liability and the punishment under those two sections are the criminal liabilities referred to in section 16 (a)—

And then I proceeded to read the entire subsection (d).

Later on, Mr. President, on page 2185 of the RECORD, is the following language in the middle of a sentence:

The Administrator issues a ruling, even though it be not binding, the man ought not be subject either to criminal liability or to liquidated damages, in the event he has relied upon the ruling of the Administrator.

Following this observation, Mr. President, occurred the following colloquy:

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the Senator that, where an individual in good faith relies upon a ruling of the Administrator, he should not be subject to criminal or civil action thereafter.

Mr. DONNELL. Pardon me. The Senator, I think, means criminal liability or civil liability for liquidated damages.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct; that is what I am talking about.

Again, Mr. President, on page 2186 of the RECORD, appears the following:

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Nebraska. I want to call to his attention, so that there will not be any possible misunderstanding, to the fact that the only exemption from liability or punishment that is granted even by the amendment which the Senator has submitted is from criminal liability or liability for liquidated damages.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand that.

Mr. President, it is obvious, I think, from what I have read that the clear intent of the committee and the clear intent of myself was that the language "liability nor punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of the act" should not extend further than criminal liability. In other words, to illustrate, if an employer had received a ruling from the Administrator that the employer was not covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act, and he should have thereafter paid his employees 15 cents an hour, it was not my intention that if it subsequently should develop that the employer was covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act he should be exempt from the payment of the difference between 15 cents and 40 cents. It was my intention solely, as indicated clearly here, that only in the case of criminal liability and in the case of an additional liability for liquidated damages, which is time and one-half over again for overtime, should there be any release of an employer from liability on account of acting in good faith in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling of the Administrator.

So, Mr. President, in order that the point made by the distinguished Senator from Nevada, which I think was an excellent point to present to the Senate—though I think possibly there may be some argument on the other hand—in order that any possible ambiguity may be removed, I respectfully move the adoption of the amendment which I have proposed to the Wherry amendment, and I read it again as follows:

Amend the amendment proposed by Mr. WHERRY to H. R. 2157:

(a) by inserting, in line 1 of the amendment, quotation marks immediately preceding (d); and

(b) by striking out, in said line 1, the words "liability nor."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, there has just come to my hand the Journal of Commerce of Wednesday, March 19, 1947, dealing with the subject which the Senate has before it now, and I read as follows:

SENATE PORTAL PAY BILL CONFUSES ISSUE, INDUSTRY CRITICS CHARGE

WASHINGTON, March 18.—New objections to the pending Senate portal pay bill cropped up today, voiced by spokesmen for groups which have the largest stake in its success.

Industry representatives here disclosed their fear that the measure in its present form may turn out to be as bad or perhaps worse than the situation it is aimed at correcting.

The intent of the bill—to wipe out portal pay suits—is wholly endorsed, they pointed out, but the method proposed appears to be full of loopholes.

This charge was made as debate on the measure moved slowly through its third day, with the prospects of reaching a final vote before late tomorrow growing increasingly dim.

LANGUAGE DISPUTED

Industry attacks on the pending bill, as written by the Senate Judiciary Committee, centered around the contention that it means one thing but says another. The language used in certain crucial sections, it is claimed, appears to invite even more portal pay suits.

The disputed language does not appear in the House portal pay measure, known as the Gwynne bill, and may yet be removed in a joint conference after passage of the Senate legislation. Nevertheless, it is claimed the latter now appears to "freeze" the Supreme Court's Mount Clemens decision, rather than correct it.

Specifically, the argument boils down to this:

In its report on the bill the Judiciary Committee observed that "the particular time at which the employee commences his principal activity or activities and ceases them constitutes the beginning and the end of his workday."

Then the report proceeds to illustrate the meaning of "principal activity or activities" through examples in which employees are said to be at work when they:

1. Oil, grease, or clean a machine, such as a lathe, before putting it into operation, and

2. Report 30 minutes early to distribute material to be worked on during the scheduled shift.

SEES RACE STARTED AGAIN

In the words of an employer spokesman, who declined to the use of his name, "This simply starts the old rat-race all over again." If the measure becomes law—with its present legislative history—employees will be able to sue for time now characterized as portal-to-portal, it is claimed.

By thus stipulating that certain preparatory activities are to be paid for by employers, the legislation would appear to reiterate the principle already laid down by the high court, and probably would be so argued by unions, the bill's critics maintain.

A similar criticism was made by Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR. (Republican, Massachusetts), who contended that the bill attempts to define portal time by exclusion, rather than settling down specific limits on what now is to be considered compensable activity.

The contention was denied, however, by Senator FORREST C. DONNELL (Republican, Missouri), chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee which wrote the bill, and who concluded today a lengthy explanation of the measure begun in the Senate last Friday.

In his final remarks, Mr. DONNELL disclosed that he has prepared an amendment to the measure which more completely defines the circumstances under which an employer can plead a defense against a back-wage suit because he acted in good faith under Wage and Hour Administration rulings.

The amendment largely is concerned with specifying that the order, rule, or regulation relied on must be in written form.

In a speech following shortly afterward, Republican whip KENNETH WHERRY, of Nebraska, told the Senate that he preferred the Gwynne bill to the one being debated because the latter did not go far enough.

I wished to draw the attention of the able chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. DONNELL] to the expressions occurring in this publication. This is an industrial newspaper, and the spokesman for the employers. If they are now perplexed as to what we are doing, certainly it is time for the Judiciary Committee to take the bill back and review the entire question again, and see if we cannot report a bill which will at least do something toward relieving the situation.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for giving us the views expressed in the Journal of Commerce. I observe that nothing in what he has read indicated what representatives of industry gave the interview, or what industries were concerned in the interview.

The various points which have been mentioned are very similar to the points which were presented this afternoon by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island. I can assure the Senator that each and every point mentioned in that article will be taken up and answered decisively on the floor of the Senate before a vote occurs upon either the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island or upon the bill itself.

We have nothing to be ashamed of in the bill. The bill is the result of hard, diligent labor over a period beginning approximately January 12, 1947. We are able to defend the bill on the floor of the Senate against any attack that has been made or can be made against it. However, I shall not at this hour, 25 minutes to 10, undertake to answer in advance the argument which I understand the distinguished Senator from Nevada proposes to make with respect to his amendment. I have no doubt that we shall fully develop at that time the points which he makes with respect to it. They will receive careful, considerate, and deliberate attention before the Senate, in the effort to show the answer to each and every one of the points he shall make.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator. He has been exceedingly courteous to me. I hope he will understand that my interruption is not at all intended to interrupt the train of his thought. However, the Senator expressed the truth when he said that the subcommittee had labored long. I wonder if the Senator remembers that something has been said about a mountain having labored once upon a time. Has the Senator thought of that?

Mr. DONNELL. I appreciate the very kind remark of the Senator, and particularly the inference which is sought to be drawn. It was stated on the floor of the Senate this afternoon that nine separate drafts of this bill had been made by the subcommittee. I think that is correct. In addition, I may say that I think the subcommittee deserves credit for frankness and honesty when it develops that some time ago there was brought back to the Committee on the Judiciary the first bill which was reported. It was brought back at the instance of the subcommittee, which felt that the bill could be materially improved. Since that time the members of the subcommittee, assisted by other members of the Judiciary Committee itself, have labored long and diligently.

So far as the mountain which labored and brought forth a mouse is concerned, let me say that this afternoon the Senator from Nevada was kind enough to say that the document which has been produced here, in contrast with the document which he pointed out as having originated in the House of Representatives, has been drawn in what he characterized, as I recall, in a lawyer-like manner. I do not know whether that was meant in sarcasm or not. I take it not, because the Senator from Nevada is himself a distinguished lawyer. Before the American Bar Association in session at Atlantic City a few weeks ago he delivered a notable address which I had the pleasure of placing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Senator from Nevada is a great lawyer. We admire his standing, and treasure his contribution to the work of the Senate. Let me say this time, with all the earnestness I possess, that the subcommittee has labored and has brought forth a document which it feels is the best document that can be prepared by the subcommitee, or, so far as we know, by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senator was kind enough to say that he did not desire to interrupt the train of my thought. I appreciate that point. I am very glad to have in the RECORD what he read from the Journal of Commerce. Let me say to him that so far as I can see, nothing that was read and nothing that has been said has anything to do with the amendment which I have just offered, namely, an amendment applicable to one line in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] to section 10 of the bill.

I renew my motion that the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska be amended, first, by inserting in line 1 of the amendment quotation marks immediately preceding "(d)"; and second, by striking out in the same line the words "liability nor."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended. The committee amendment is still open to amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to propound an inquiry to the majority leader as to the length of time he expects to hold the Senate in session?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it had been the hope that we might dispose of this proposed legislation today. It is now perfectly certain that that cannot be done. It then became the hope that we might dispose of the so-called Wherry amendment and the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH]. I wonder if that amendment can be disposed of at this time. If it could be promptly disposed of, I think the intention would be to take a recess at that time.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, if the query was addressed to me, let me say that I understand that some other Senators desire to be heard. I think the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] wishes to be heard. I hope that I may not be required to proceed tonight with the discussion of the amendment offered on behalf of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] and myself. I have tried to arrange that such discussion shall take place tomorrow. Our observations on the proposed amendment will be presented quite in detail, and perhaps at some length. Some time will be required to present them.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] has an amendment which we may be able to dispose of tonight.

Mr. WHITE. I hope that we shall be able to dispose of the amendment of the Senator from Florida, and I think that when that is done there will be no objection to a motion to recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, it will take only a few minutes to present the facts in connection with my amendment. I understand that my distinguished colleague is ready to proceed tonight, and I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. PEPPER. It may be that not much time will be needed. I do not wish to keep the Senate very late. I shall be glad to have my colleague proceed with his amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 19, at the end of line 7, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following: "except that, in any State having a statute of limitations of 1 year or more but less than 2 years with respect to such claims, suit to enforce any such claim shall be forever barred unless commenced in a court of competent jurisdiction within the applicable period provided by the State statute of limitations."

On page 19, line 14, before the word "period", it is proposed to insert "2-year."

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if I had the choice of time, I certainly would not bring up my amendment at this late hour. I hope that the Senate will be indulgent enough to listen to the argument for a very few minutes, because that is all the time I propose to take.

The proposed amendment is offered in an effort to preserve to the State of Florida and six other States which have an identical provision in their laws the benefits which have accrued, at least in the case of my State, as I see it, because of our having a statute of limitations of 1 year applicable to this kind of action.

I wish to call attention to four points in connection with this amendment, and I shall do so very briefly.

First, Florida is not the only State in this situation. The seven States which have similar statutes are as follows: Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Florida, Louisiana, North Dakota, and South Carolina.

In addition, as I understand, although I have not read the act, the State of Mississippi is in the same situation by reason of the fact, I am told, that their State supreme court has adopted as applicable to its situation a 1-year statute of limitations which is designed to govern all cases of penalty. So really there are eight States, if I am correctly advised, which would be affected by this amendment.

The second point which I make is with reference to the resuults in my own State. I do not presume to speak for Senators from any other States, or even, for that matter, for my distinguished colleague [Mr. PEPPER].

As I have observed results in my own State, it seems to me that they have been exceedingly good. In the first place, the amendment was adopted in 1943. I was one of those participating in its adoption. We had no kind of opposition from any factor of our citizenship, and up to this moment I have not had called to my attention any opposition to this amendment from any person, either a labor leader or any other citizen of our State.

In the next place, that clause in our statute has been the principal reason why we have not had a portal-to-portal suit instituted in our State. The results have apparently been good elsewhere, because on referring to pages 768 and 769 of the printed record of the hearings before the very able subcommittee I note that only four States are shown to have had no portal-to-portal suits instituted, and those four States are States which have 1-year statutes of limitation. They are, as shown by the record upon which I rely, the States of South Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, and North Dakota. I notice, likewise, that the Federal districts other than those four States in which there have been no suits instituted lie almost entirely in other States in which 1-year statutes of limitation apply.

So it would appear, Mr. President, that this measure has been one which has been conducive to peaceful relations rather than otherwise; and in view of the total absence of any complaint, at least in my State, I am hopeful that we may be able to continue the peaceful relations by making this particular provision applicable to the States which are affected.

I may say, Mr. President, that this result would be accomplished, as to the portal-to-portal suits which may be brought up to date by the passage of the bill, by the second paragraph on page 19 of the printed bill, which includes not only the 2-year statute of limitations, but includes also the protection of any other statute of limitations. I am now referring to the committee amendment. The amendment here proposed reaches the same conclusion with reference to the future period of time which will lie ahead after the enactment of the bill if it be enacted.

The third point which I wish to bring out is that the House bill, upon which the Senate committee's action was predicated in the first place, had a 1-year provision which, if it were enacted, would apply to all cases and in all States. I am not advocating a return to that situation, because I take it that there was good reason why the committee departed from the philosophy embraced in the House bill. I do not wish to be offensive to anyone, but I feel that there is good reason for the continuance of the 1-year statute of limitations by the States which have adopted it.

In addition, it seems to me that perhaps the principal point which I could make—and this is the fourth point that I make—is that there is no question of new procedure or new philosophy engrafted upon this important bill; and certainly I do not want to hurt the bill in its important and essential qualities by the adoption of a statute of limitation which is not uniform in all the States.

The distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] brought out in his argument yesterday the question of uniformity. I call his attention and that of other Senators to the fact that from its very inception the Fair Labor Standards Act has not been uniform in operation, but by its terms has recognized States' rights, State enactments, and disparities in State laws in all three of the important fields in which the act operates. I quote briefly from section 18 of the Fair Labor Standards Act:

SEC. 18. No provision of this act or of any order thereunder shall excuse noncompliance with any Federal or State law or municipal ordinance establishing a minimum wage higher than the minimum wage established under this act or a maximum workweek lower than the maximum workweek established under this act, and no provision of this act relating to the employment of child labor shall justify noncompliance with any Federal or State law or municipal ordinance establishing a higher standard than the standard established under this act.

In other words, Mr. President, it is quite apparent that in all three of the fields of operation of this act—namely, minimum wages, maximum hours, and child labor—from the very beginning the philosophy of this act has allowed recognition of the fact that States have enacted measures which were different from this measure, and has allowed those differences to be reflected into this very measure.

So, Mr. President, as we come now to the time when apparently there is behind this measure a feeling that divergent statutes have, in many cases, been too long in operation—some of them running as long as 8 years—and when very evidently an effort is being made to correct that situation by going to a much lower limitation and a much shorter requirement—namely, 1 year in the original House bill; 2 years in the committee substitute; and 3 years in the substitute which I understand will be offered tomorrow by the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], and the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH]—it is quite apparent that in the conception of all these proposals we are moving toward a shorter time limit. Some of the States heretofore have moved to a shorter limitation—although in no instance to less than 1 year; and I am not attempting here to take care of the two instances in which efforts have been made to reduce the limitation to below 1 year. Inasmuch as some of the States have moved to a 1-year limitation and have enjoyed a relative freedom from industrial disputes largely because of that fact, I am hopeful that their interest in this field may be recognized by the adoption of this amendment by the Senate.

Mr. President, without taking further time, I simply state again my hope that the Senate will adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly in opposition to the amendment offered by the distinguished junior Senator from Florida.

I point out, first, that I think the underlying principle of his amendment involves a very unsound economic principle. I think we need to recognize, first, that the Fair Labor Standards Act was passed as a national policy. It was the decision of the Congress that it should set up such minimum standards for the protection, on a Nation-wide basis, of the people who fall within the terms of the act. That was the substantive part of the law.

I think the Congress needs to keep in mind at all times that it is impossible to separate substantive and procedural rights, because when we establish a variation in procedural rights, we thereby change, to the extent that procedural rights affect substantive rights, the substantive rights of the people of the States that have a more advantageous procedure than do other States.

The second point I wish to make, Mr. President, is that if we are going to work in the direction of uniformity in respect to substantive rights, then in the administration of a Federal statute I think there should also be uniformity in procedural rights and remedies. Of course, the proposal made by the junior Senator from Florida, depending upon which way it is looked at, gives an advantage either to employers or to workers in States, according to the differences in the statutes of limitations in the States in which they live, insofar as the statutes would be applied to the Federal law to which the amendment of the Senator from Florida relates.

Of course, there are many results from such variations, Mr. President. I shall not labor the point; but one could argue that, of course, they give a certain competitive advantage to employers in States with a short statute of limitations, to the degree that a short statute of limitations may be to their advantage as employers, insofar as running the risks of liability under a statute is concerned.

But it seems to me that the point we should emphasize above all else is that if we say to American employers, under the Fair Labor Standards Act, "It shall be the policy of this Government to impose upon you these duties and liabilities," then the enforcement of those duties and liabilities should be uniform from coast to coast and from north to south.

Of course, Mr. President, what the proposal of the junior Senator from Florida seeks to do is, not to have uniformity in the administration of the act procedurally, but to have marked differences in its administration. I think that is bad legislative policy. I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment tonight, because I desire to point out that not only in connection with this particular piece of Federal legislation, but in connection with many others, we should be working in the direction of greater uniformity in the procedural-enforcement administration of the law, rather than toward disparity.

Last of all, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the action which was taken by the Senate, in the Seventy-ninth Congress, in regard to the entire question of the statute of limitations, because there is now on the desk—and I wish to have it considered in due course of time—a written amendment which I shall propose to the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] in regard to the statute of limitations. My amendment provides that the word "three", in line 5 on page 3 of their amendment, shall be stricken out, and that the word "two" shall be substituted therefor. I mention that now in connection with the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] only for the purpose of pointing out that I think the problem we faced in the Seventy-ninth Congress is again before us in the Eightieth Congress, in regard to working out a conscionable compromise on the entire question of a statute of limitations under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

In the Seventy-ninth Congress, as in this Congress, there was considered the so-called Gwynne bill, which proposed a 1-year statute of limitations amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act. That measure was before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, and my colleagues on the floor tonight who were members of the Committee on Education and Labor in the Seventy-ninth Congress will recall that a series of compromise proposals were made in executive sessions of that committee, and it was the junior Senator from Oregon who suggested that probably the most conscionable compromise or the fairest compromise we probably could reach would be one providing for a 2-year statute of limitations. The junior Senator from Oregon proposed the compromise in that committee in the Seventy-ninth Congress. He has thus taken a position on that compromise, and he renews the compromise in the Eightieth Congress, because he is on record in regard to it.

Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the very able speech delivered this afternoon by the Junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH]—a speech which has left me in considerable doubt as to what my final position will be on this proposed legislation. I wish to say that although he gave a number of reasons in support of his proposal for a 3-year statute of limitations, nevertheless I think the practical situation which faces us from the standpoint of a legislative compromise cannot be ignored, and I do not think labor will in any serious way be injured by a 2-year statute of limitations. A drive will be made again, this time for a 1-year statute of limitations, such as is provided for in the Gwynne bill; and I think we should meet that issue now by remaining united, here in the Senate, in favoring a 2-year statute of limitations proposal.

I have talked to a good many leaders of industry who have told me that they think it is a fair compromise, that they themselves think the 1-year statute of limitation to which the Senator from Florida refers, insofar as his State statute of limitations is concerned, is too short a period of time to protect the legitimate and fair rights of labor as they exist under the Fair Labor Standards Act. Likewise a good many people who speak for labor have told me, off the record, that they cannot raise any serious objection to a compromise of 2 years.

Hence I hope, Mr. President, that as we come to cast a final vote on the portal-to-portal legislation, we will recognize, as we recognized in the Seventy-ninth Congress, that a 2-year statute is a fair, reasonable, and conscionable compromise of the statute of limitations problem, and that the amendment which I have on the desk, and which will be offered in due course of time, when it is in order, to the substitute of the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island, will be adopted insofar as it proposes to substitute 2 years for 3 years in the substitute.

I close, Mr. President, by reiterating that I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida is unsound from the standpoint of good legislative practice, when it comes to the problem of providing a uniform procedure in the administration of Federal legislation. I think it is unfair to put the workers of Florida at a disadvantage as compared with the workers of other States who have a right to their remedy under a 3-year statute of limitations. I think we should say to the workers that when it comes to the procedure to be applied to Federal legislation it shall be uniform throughout the entire country.

Hence I hope the Senator's amendment will be voted down, and that we will then come to the question as to what particular statute of limitations, on a uniform basis, shall be provided in the final legislation. I sincerely hope it will be a compromise on 2 years.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has so clearly expressed his view that there remains but little to be added with respect to the matter of uniformity.

I wish to call attention to the fact that I not only thoroughly agree with the Senator from Oregon as to the desirability and importance of uniformity, and therefore cannot support the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Florida, but also that my view and the view of the Senator from Oregon are not confined to him and myself. There has been mentioned frequently on the floor during the debate Mr. L. Metcalfe Walling, who until very recently was the Administrator of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I quote these three sentences from his testimony before the subcommittee. He said:

> I shall not repeat the detailed justification for such a uniform statute which I presented to the House Judiciary Committee 2 years ago. It is not necessary any longer to justify a uniform Federal statute of limitations. Events have proven ample justification. The only question at issue is the period which should be provided.

I think, Mr. President, that the views of Mr. Walling are entitled to great weight. While we may not agree with him as to the period, nevertheless, as to the matter of uniformity, certainly there is sound judgment and excellent merit in the suggestion which he makes.

Then I refer to the fact that Mr. Abt, special counsel for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, testifying at page 162, said:

> We favor writing into the acts a reasonable time limitation on the filing of suits. We believe that such a limitation is necessary in order to secure uniformity throughout the 48 States and to place this Federal question beyond the control of diverse State laws.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has pointed out, on the one hand, as I understand his position, the competitive advantage which an employer has in a State in which there is only a 1-year statute of limitations as compared with the position of the employer in the adjoining States which have a 2-year statute of limitations. If we shall adopt a Federal statute of limitations providing for 2 years, those States which are adjacent to or near the State of Florida, as well as all other States of the Union, except the seven or eight which now have 1-year statutes, will have a period of limitation twice that of the State of Florida and the seven other States. Certainly an employer who is required to look back for only a year to see what his liabilities are is placed in a more advantageous competitive position than is an employer in an adjoining or other State who is compelled to look back 2 years in order to determine what his financial position may be.

On the other hand, with respect to labor, the Senator from Oregon has pointed out the fact that permitting one State's limitation of 1 year to prevail and in other States a limitation of 2 years, gives to the employee in the State having the 2-year statute of limitations an advantage, very great in many cases, over one in the State which has only a 1-year limitation.

Mr. President, mention was made by the distinguished Senator from Florida of the fact that the Fair Labor Standards Act contains section 18 which provides, in substance, that "No provision of this act or of any order thereunder shall excuse noncompliance with any Federal or State law or municipal ordinance," and so forth. I call attention to the fact that the language following that is this, "establishing a minimum wage higher than the minimum wage established under this act or a maximum workweek lower than the maximum workweek established under this act."

So, Mr. President, the provision which the Senator from Florida has suggested with respect to nonuniformity was for some reason placed in the Fair Labor Standards Act, doubtless in order to guarantee greater advantages to labor in States which might have laws more favorable to labor than would be the Federal law.

Yet what the Senator from Florida now proposes is that by a nonuniformity we would say to his State and the other seven States to which this particular provision would apply that labor shall be placed in a less advantageous position than it will be in the other 40 States of the Union.

For the reasons indicated by the distinguished Senator from Oregon, Mr. President, and without in any sense seeking to agree with him as to the change in the period of Federal limitation, I submit that reason in this matter is strongly in opposition to the amendment suggested by the distinguished Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I dislike to find myself in disagreement with the two distinguished Senators who have spoken, but since I am, I should like to answer briefly some of the arguments they have offered.

First, with reference to the point made by the distinguished Senator from Oregon to the effect that he was proposing to offer one or two amendments to the substitute which will be proposed tomorrow by the Senator from Nevada [Mr.

McCARRAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH], I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is lying on the table an amendment to be proposed by me to that particular substitute, which would accomplish the same result, if adopted, that the amendment pending to the committee substitute would bring about.

Second, I should like to call attention again to the fact that the act in Florida was adopted without the objection or opposition of any factor or element whatsoever, and I should like to add that up to this very moment I have yet to receive from any person speaking for labor, or any one else, any objection to the 1-year statute of limitations. To the contrary, Mr. President, our people seem to feel that here is a measure under which we have been able to compose our differences and balance our books, and not have to have heavy contingent liability on a continuing basis for a long period of time, which is the very thing that has caused the trouble that is sought to be corrected by the pending measure.

In the next place, I call attention to the fact that when Senators are arguing for uniformity, they are arguing that this after all is a procedural matter, whereas they are winking at the fact that there is practical nonuniformity in substantial portions of the country, namely, on the questions of hours, wages, and of the details of child-labor provisions of the law.

There is not the slightest doubt in the world that any argument advanced by either of the distinguished Senators to the effect that there would be unfair competitive advantages, if the pending amendments were adopted, is true in much greater measure, if true at all, when it is admitted, by looking at the provisions of the bill themselves, that there is now and has always been from the very beginning nonuniformity in all three of the major fields of coverage of the bill.

I again call the attention of the Senate to the fact that nonuniformity exists, because in the very beginning it was recognized that the experience of the States was valuable and that the action of the States was worth while, that there was still such a thing as State rights in this Nation; and the Congress, enacting the measure some years ago, felt that there should be recognition of experience and progress made by the States in this particular field.

The last point I want to make, Mr. President and Senators, is that under the measure as originally enacted and as existent tonight, and as it will exist up to the time this bill becomes operative, if it does, there is no uniformity whatever on the question of the statute of limitations, because the Federal law contains no statute of limitations. The various States have had statutes running all the way from 6 months to 8 years, and the Nation has lived pretty well for all the years of its existence, with all of that nonuniformity. Now it starts to get away from those extremely long statutes of limitations, and that is one of the purposes calling for the enactment of this act; but I do not feel that purpose alone calls for the neglect of the useful experience which has been had by seven States under statutes, and by one State under court rule, under which 1-year statutes have been found to be helpful, so helpful that there has been a virtual disappearance of any sort of confusion or bickering between industry and labor in the States where those measures exist.

Before I sit down, I want to say to the distinguished Senator from Oregon that I doubt if there are many Senators on this floor who can speak for a labor which showed the qualities that it had in the State of Florida during the war, in that, despite the fact that we had 17 shipyards, despite the fact that we had dozens of factories turning out foods, and many other factories turning out war products, with a total of more than a quarter of a million people working in war industries, we had not one single stoppage for 1 minute, or the delay of one single bit of war products in our State. That is the kind of labor we have there, that is the kind of working together between our working people and those in executive positions, which was maintained during the war.

No, Mr. President, and Senators, I am not here trying to deprive the working people of Florida of anything whatever, but I am simply saying to the Senate that our State has had useful experience under this measure, and that it feels it is entitled to speak of that experience to the Senate, and to ask for the continuance of the benefits which we have already felt under our existing statute of limitations, in which I think we are joined by seven other good States who have had that same experience. I only hope that the Senate will see fit to adopt the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, replying to the two points which the Senator from Florida has made in his argument: First, I want to point out that there are no workers who are not covered by the present Fair Labor Standards Act in one State and not in another. It is uniform throughout the country, and the situation is not such that workers in any particular State are covered, while workers in another State are not covered. Let me put it in this way; the lack of coverage so far as substantive rights under the Fair Labor Standards Act is concerned are uniform throughout the country. In my opinion that needs to be pointed out, because I think from what the Senator from Florida has said somebody might misinterpret his remarks to indicate that there is a lack of uniformity throughout the country as to a substantive right under the act.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. In a second I shall be glad to yield. I think that the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] in his very able speech today, made very clear why the Fair Labor Standards Act does not cover all occupations in the country. There is a good political reason why that is so: When the act was before the Congress, it could not have been passed if certain exceptions involving certain occupations had not been made, for example domestic service, and agricultural workers. I hope now, however, that we are working in a direction toward increased coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act, rather than in a direction of producing lack of uniformity in the coverage already within the terms of the act.

What the Senator from Florida is proposing it seems to me, is that when we come to pass upon what type of statute of limitations shall be enacted, by way of amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act, we should adopt a statute based upon the principle of lack of uniformity, and I say that that will have the effect of producing injustices to workers in certain States.

I may say it is my personal opinion, certainly, that as he says, the Senator from Florida is not trying to work any injustice to labor in the State of Florida; but comparing the effect of a 1-year statute in the State of Florida with a 2-year or a 3-year or a 4-year statute applicable to workers in other States, the effect is that the workers in Florida would not get the same advantage under his proposal as would accrue to the workers in other States that have a longer statute of limitations. I think a fair and reasonable and equitable and conscionable compromise on this matter is a uniform 2-year period, such as I suggested earlier in my remarks.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. MORSE. I am very happy to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is the Senator trying to say that under section 18 of the Fair Labor Standards Act there is uniformity amongst the States of the Nation, either with reference to minimum wages or with reference to maximum hours, or with reference to child-labor provisions?

Mr. MORSE. Certainly, after the terms of the section run. It was so devised as to produce an ultimate uniformity of application.

Mr. HOLLAND. If the Senator will yield further, I must say that either I do not understand him or he has thoroughly misunderstood the provisions of this section of the act. This section of the act provides very clearly that any State having standards different from the Federal standards, but higher as to the minimum wage; different from the Federal standards, but lower as to the maximum workweek; different from the Federal standards, but called here higher in the field of child labor—that such State standards shall apply and they are made applicable under the provisions of this act; which makes it very clear, crystal clear, that there is no uniformity in the three fields of operation of the act, and that there has been none since the very beginning.

Mr. MORSE. I respectfully suggest that I think the Senator from Florida is misinterpreting the act. The Fair Labor Standards Act is uniform in its application of the minimum standards and criteria set out in the act. Those minimum standards are applicable in all States to all employees covered by the act. The Senator from Florida is mistaken if he has the impression that any lack of uniformity in the act relates to the minimum standards of hours and wages called for by the act. Section 18 to which he refers makes this point very clear. That section reads as follows:

SEC. 18. No provision of this act or of any order thereunder shall excuse noncompliance with any Federal or State law or municipal ordinance establishing a minimum wage higher than the minimum wage established under this act or a maximum workweek lower than the maximum workweek established under this act, and no provision of this act relating to the employment of child labor shall justify noncompliance with any Federal or State law or municipal ordinance establishing a higher standard than the standard established under this act. No provision of this act shall justify any employer in reducing a wage paid by him which is in excess of the applicable minimum wage under this act, or justify any employer in increasing hours of employment maintained by him which are shorter than the maximum hours applicable under this act.

As I read that section it simply says that a State shall have the right to provide standards above the minimum fixed by the Fair Labor Standards Act, but the State cannot pass any legislation which lowers the minimum provided for in the act, whether the State act refers to wages or to hours or to child labor or to any other factors.

The point I want to stress above all else in this exchange with the Senator from Florida is that his amendment does create a lack of uniformity as to procedural rights and a lack of uniformity of procedural rights creates, in effect, a lack of uniformity in the substantive benefits under the act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] is absent because of illness.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] is absent because of illness. If present and voting he would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] are necessarily absent. If present and voting the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay."

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting he would vote "nay."

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] is absent by leave of the Senate because of illness in his family.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BUCK], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BUSHFIELD], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] is necessarily absent and is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senators from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. O'DANIEL], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HOEY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] is absent because of illness.

I announce further that the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED].

If present and voting the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—23

Byrd	Knowland	O'Conor
Ellender	Lucas	Robertson, Va.
Ferguson	McCarran	Stewart
Gurney	McClellan	Taft

So Mr. HOLLAND'S amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, it may be that I shall find it necessary later tonight to make a trip to my State. If I should find it necessary on that account to be absent from the Senate, I ask to be excused for such time as I may be away.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator's request is granted.

RECESS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, considering that we cannot complete this legislation today, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, March 20, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate March 19 (legislative day of February 19), 1947:

UNITED STATES MARSHAL

John Wesley Thompson Falkner IV, of Mississippi, to be United States marshal for the northern district of Mississippi, vice Ira Lamar Morgan, term expired.

SENATE

THURSDAY, MARCH 20, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 19, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hast the words of eternal life, help us to cultivate proper speech. Surrounded as we are in this city with noble inscriptions of the plain, stirring words of wise men, may we say what we mean and mean what we say. And may it be worth saying. Teach us economy in speech that neither wounds nor offends, that affords light without generating heat. Bridle our tongues lest they stampede us into utterances of which, later, we shall be ashamed. This we ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, March 19, 1947, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 276) to provide for payment and settlement of mileage and other travel allowance accounts of military personnel, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. WHITE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hawkes	Morse
Baldwin	Hayden	Murray
Ball	Hickenlooper	Myers
Barkley	Hill	O'Conor
Bricker	Hoey	O'Daniel
Bridges	Holland	O'Mahoney
Brooks	Ives	Pepper
Buck	Jenner	Reed

Ferguson	McMahon	Wherry
Flanders	Magnuson	White
Fulbright	Malone	Wiley
George	Martin	Williams
Green	Maybank	Wilson
Gurney	Millikin	Young
Hatch	Moore

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is absent by leave of the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, my colleague the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] has had to leave the floor of the Senate to take a plane for an engagement which he must keep. Accordingly, he has been unable to request for himself, but has asked me to do so for him, that he may be excused from the sessions of the Senate through next Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, consent of the Senate is granted.

TREATY WITH REPUBLIC OF CHINA—EXECUTIVE J, EIGHTIETH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As in executive session, the Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation between the United States of America and the Republic of China, together with a protocol thereto, signed at Nanking on November 4, 1946. The enclosed treaty is a comprehensive instrument which takes into account the developments in international relationships during the past century and is intended to meet effectively the needs of the present day.

I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, a report on the treaty made to me by the Acting Secretary of State.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 20, 1947.

(Enclosures: 1. Report of the Acting Secretary of State; 2. Treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation with China, with protocol, signed at Nanking, November 4, 1946.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the injunction of secrecy will be removed from the treaty, and, without objection, it will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the injunction of secrecy was removed from the treaty, and it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 18, 1947.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House:

The undersigned, the Acting Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation between the United States of America and the Republic of China, together with a protocol thereto, signed at Nanking on November 4, 1946.

Negotiation of the treaty was carried out pursuant to that part of article VII of the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Republic of China for the Relinquishment of Extraterritorial Rights in China and the Regulation of Related Matters, signed at Washington on January 11, 1943 (57 Stat., pt. 2, 771), which provides that the two Governments "will enter into negotiations for the conclusion of a comprehensive modern treaty of friendship, commerce, navigation, and consular rights, upon the request of either Government or in any case within 6 months after the cessation of the hostilities in the war against the common enemies." In accordance with the provision quoted above, the enclosed treaty includes provisions with respect to the rights of individuals and corporations and with respect to commerce and navigation. It is intended that consular provisions be set forth in a separate instrument.

The present instrument includes provisions which were drafted in the light of suggestions from representative private organizations which have been active in the promotion of cultural and commercial relations with China. Departments and agencies of the Federal Government which deal directly with the subjects covered by the treaty were consulted and gave their assistance in the preparations for the negotiations.

The enclosed treaty, which is basically similar to treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation now in force between the United States and various other countries, is intended to provide a comprehensive legal framework for relations between the United States and China. It is believed that the treaty offers an adequate basis for the development of cultural, business, and trade relationships to the mutual advantage of the two countries. During the negotiations the Department's endeavor was to draw up an instrument which would be responsive to the needs growing out of the problems and practices of present-day international relationships, particularly to the changes in economic and commercial practice resulting from increasing use of the corporate form of business enterprise. Thus this treaty, as compared with earlier commercial treaties, contains somewhat broadened and modernized provisions, so as to make more specific and detailed the rights and privileges of corporations. The wording of the commercial provisions reflects recent experience in the drafting of provisions to protect American exports from the many new and complex forms of trade restriction and exchange control which have come into use since the early 1930's.

The articles of the treaty may be classified, according to subject matter, into the following categories: (1) rights of individuals and corporations; (2) exchange of goods; (3) navigation; and (4) general matters.

These categories may be summarized as follows:

1. Rights of individuals and corporations: As is customary in treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation, provisions are included with respect to entry, travel, residence, the conduct of designated activities (including those of a commercial, manufacturing, scientific, educational, religious, and philanthropic nature), freedom of worship, protection of property against uncompensated expropriation, access to courts, freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures, compulsory military services, and landholding. Provisions with respect to commercial arbitration are for the first time included in this treaty. More extensive safeguards are afforded against discriminatory exchange control, and greater protection is provided with respect to literary, artistic, and industrial property.

2. Exchange of goods: In addition to the provisions relating to most-favored-nation treatment as to import and export duties and national treatment as to internal taxation of imported articles, usually included in treaties of this type, the provisions with respect to the exchange of goods include rules applicable to customs administration, quotas and their allocation, exchange control, public monopolies as they may affect trade between the United States and China, and the awarding of public contracts and concessions. With respect to the provisions relating to the exchange of goods, most-favored-nation treatment is generally provided. In accordance with customary practice in the case of treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation, the present instrument does not contain schedules of duty concessions.

3. Navigation: Standard articles on navigation, relating to such matters as entry of vessels into ports, freedom from discriminatory port charges, and most-favored-nation treatment with respect to the coasting trade, are contained in the present treaty, in a somewhat revised form. The rules set forth are designed to be applied to public vessels which may be engaged in commerce, as well as to private vessels.

4. General matters: The treaty provides for certain exceptions to its application, including the usual provisions regarding sanitary regulations and moral and humanitarian measures. Exceptions also are included to give the two parties the requisite freedom of action in times of national emergency and to keep the instrument in general conformity with the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund. Other provisions relate to such matters as the territories to which the treaty is to apply, the submission to the International Court of Justice of disputes concerning questions of interpretation or application, and the superseding of provisions of certain treaties now in force between the United States and China.

Provision is made in the treaty for its entry into force on the day of the exchange of ratifications and for its continuance in force for a period of 5 years from that day and thereafter, subject to termination at any time following the 5-year period on 1 year's notice by either Government to the other Government.

It should be noted that the present instrument will not limit or restrict the rights, privileges, and advantages accorded by the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Republic of China for the Relinquishment of Extraterritorial Rights in China and the Regulation of Related Matters, and accompanying exchange of notes, signed at Washington on January 11, 1943.

The protocol, which is to have the same validity as if its provisions were inserted in the text of the treaty, is intended for the purpose of clarifying and construing certain provisions of the treaty.

Approval of the treaty was given by the Legislative Yuan of China on November 9, 1946.

Respectfully submitted.

DEAN ACHESON.

TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP, COMMERCE, AND NAVIGATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA

The United States of America and the Republic of China, desirous of strengthening the bond of peace and the ties of friendship which have happily long prevailed between the two countries by arrangements designed to promote friendly intercourse between their respective territories through provisions responsive to the spiritual, cultural, economic, and commercial aspirations of the peoples thereof, have resolved to conclude a Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation, and for that purpose have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries,

The President of the United States of America:

Dr. J. Leighton Stuart, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of China, and

Mr. Robert Lacy Smyth, Special Commissioner and Consul General of the United States of America at Tientsin; and,

The President of the National Government of the Republic of China:

Dr. Wang Shih-chieh, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of China, and

Dr. Wang Hua-cheng, Director of the Treaty Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of China;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers found to be in due form, have agreed upon the following Articles:

ARTICLE I

1. There shall be constant peace and firm and lasting friendship between the United States of America and the Republic of China.

2. The Government of each High Contracting Party shall have the right to send to the Government of the other High Contracting Party duly accredited diplomatic representatives, who shall be received and, upon the basis of reciprocity, shall enjoy in the territories of such other High Contracting Party the rights, privileges, exemptions and immunities accorded under generally recognized principles of international law.

ARTICLE II

1. The nationals of either High Contracting Party shall be permitted to enter the territories of the other High Contracting Party, and shall be permitted to reside, travel and carry on trade throughout the whole extent of such territories. In the enjoyment of the right to reside and travel, the nationals of either High Contracting Party shall be subject, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, to the applicable laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities, provided that they shall not be subject to unreasonable interference and that they shall not be required to apply for or carry any travel documents, other than (a) valid passports or (b) other documents of identification issued by the competent authorities of their respective countries.

2. The nationals of either High Contracting Party shall, throughout the whole extent of the territories of the other High Contracting Party, be permitted, without interference, to engage in and to carry on commercial, manufacturing, processing, scientific, educational, religious and philanthropic activities not forbidden by the laws and regulations enforced by the duly constituted authorities; to engage in every profession not reserved exclusively to nationals of the country; to acquire, hold, erect or lease, and occupy appropriate buildings, and to lease appropriate lands, for residential, commercial, manufacturing, processing, professional, scientific, educational, religious, and philanthropic and mortuary purposes; to employ agents or employees of their choice regardless of nationality; to do anything incidental to or necessary for the enjoyment of any such rights and privileges; and to exercise all these rights and privileges upon the same terms as nationals of such other High Contracting Party in conformity with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities.

3. The nationals of either High Contracting Party shall not in any case, in the enjoyment of the rights and privileges provided by paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article, receive treatment with respect to such rights and privileges less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals of any third country.

4. Nothing in this Treaty shall be construed to affect existing statutes of either High Contracting Party in relation to immigration or the right of either High Contracting Party to enact statutes relating to immigration; provided, however, that nothing in this paragraph shall prevent the nationals of either High Contracting Party from entering, traveling and residing in the territories of the other High Contracting Party in order to carry on trade between the United States of America and the Republic of China, or to engage in any commercial activity related thereto or connected therewith, upon terms as favorable as are or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals of any third country entering, traveling and residing in such territories in order to carry on trade between such other High Contracting Party and such third country or to engage in commercial activity related to or connected with such trade; and provided further that nothing in the provisions of Section 3 of the Immigration Act of the United States of America dated February 5, 1917, which delimit certain geographical zones for the purpose of restricting immigration, shall be construed as preventing admission into the United States of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent.

ARTICLE III

1. As used in this Treaty the term "corporations and associations" shall mean corporations, companies, partnerships and other associations, whether or not with limited liability and whether or not for pecuniary profit, which have been or may hereafter be created or organized under the applicable laws and regulations enforced by the duly constituted authorities.

2. Corporations and associations created or organized under the applicable laws and regulations enforced by the duly constituted authorities within the territories of either High Contracting Party shall be deemed to be corporations and associations of such High Contracting Party and shall have their juridical status recognized within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, whether or not they have a permanent establishment, branch or agency therein. Corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall have the right to establish their branch offices in the territories of the other High Contracting Party and to fulfill their functions therein after they have complied with requirements of admission not inconsistent with the provisions of the following paragraph, orcvided that the right to exercise such functions is accorded by this Treaty or the exercise of such functions is otherwise consistent with the laws and regulations of such other High Contracting Party.

3. The High Contracting Parties, adhering generally to the principle of national treatment with respect to the matters enumerated in this paragraph, agree that corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall be permitted, throughout the whole extent of the territories of the other High Contracting Party, in conformity with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities, to engage in and carry on commercial, manufacturing, processing, financial, scientific, educational, religious and philanthropic activities; to acquire, hold, erect or lease, and occupy appropriate buildings, and to lease appropriate lands, for commercial, manufacturing, processing, financial, scientific, educational, religious and philanthropic purposes; to employ agents or employees of their choice regardless of nationality; to do anything incidental to or necessary for the enjoyment of such rights and privileges; and to exercise all these rights and privileges, without interference, upon the same terms as corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party unless otherwise provided by the laws of that High Contracting Party. The preceding sentence, and all other provisions of this Treaty according to corporations and associations of the Republic of China rights and privileges upon the same terms as corporations and associations of the United States of America, shall be construed as according such rights and privileges, in any state, territory or possession of the United States of America, upon the same terms as such rights and privileges are or may hereafter be accorded therein to corporations and associations created or organized in other states, territories or possessions of the United States of America.

4. Corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall not in any case, in the enjoyment of the rights and privileges provided by this article, receive treatment with respect to such rights and privileges less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to corporations and associations of any third country.

ARTICLE IV

1. The nationals, corporations, and associations of either High Contracting Party shall enjoy, throughout the territories of the other High Contracting Party, rights and privileges with respect to organization of and participation in corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party, including the enjoyment of rights with respect to promotion and incorporation, the purchase, ownership and sale of shares and, in the case of nationals, the holding of executive and official positions, in conformity with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities, upon the same terms as nationals, corporations and associations of any third country. Corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party, organized or participated in by nationals, corporations and associations of the other High Contracting Party pursuant to the rights and privileges enumerated in this paragraph shall be permitted to exercise the functions for which they are created or organized, in conformity with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities, upon the same terms as corporations and associations that are similarly organized or participated in by nationals, corporations and associations of any third country. With respect to the ownership of stock by nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party in corporations and associations of the other High Contracting Party engaged in mining on public lands of such other High Contracting Party, neither High Contracting Party shall be obligated by the provisions of this paragraph to accord rights and privileges greater than those which its nationals, corporations and associations receive from the other High Contracting Party.

2. The nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall enjoy, throughout the territories of the other High Contracting Party, and in conformity with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities, the right to organize and participate in, including the right to control and manage, corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party for engaging in commercial, manufacturing, processing, scientific, educational, religious and philanthropic activities; provided, however, that neither High Contracting Party shall be obligated to accord within its territories to the nationals, corporations and associations of the other High Contracting Party, treatment with respect to such organization and participation, including the right to control and manage, as favorable as that which is or may hereafter be accorded to its own nationals, corporations and associations.

3. Corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party organized and participated in, including those controlled and those managed, by nationals, corporations and associations of the other High Contracting Party pursuant to the rights and privileges enumerated in the preceding paragraph shall be permitted to engage in and carry on such commercial, manufacturing, processing, scientific, educational, religious and philanthropic activities within the territories of the High Contracting Party under the laws of which they are organized upon the same terms as corporations and associations of such High Contracting Party organized and participated in, including those controlled and those managed, by its own nationals, corporations and associations, in conformity with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities.

ARTICLE V

Should either High Contracting Party hereafter accord rights in respect of exploration for and exploitation of mineral resources in its territories to nationals, corporations or associations of any third country, such rights shall be accorded to nationals, corporations or associations of the other High Contracting Party, in conformity with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities.

ARTICLE VI

1. Throughout the whole extent of the territories of each High Contracting Party the nationals of the other High Contracting Party shall receive the most constant protection and security for their persons and property, and shall enjoy in this respect the full protection and security required by international law. To these ends, persons accused of crime shall be brought to trial promptly, and shall enjoy all the rights and privileges which are or may hereafter be accorded by the laws and regulations enforced by the duly constituted authorities; and nationals of either High Contracting Party, while within the custody of the authorities of the other High Contracting Party, shall receive reasonable and humane treatment. In so far as the term "nationals" where used in this paragraph is applicable in relation to property it shall be construed to include corporations and associations.

2. The property of nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall not be taken within the territories of the other High Contracting Party without due process of law and without the prompt payment of just and effective compensation. The recipient of such compensation shall, in conformity with such applicable laws and regulations as are not inconsistent with paragraph 3 of Article XIX of this Treaty, be permitted without interference to withdraw the compensation by obtaining foreign exchange, in the currency of the High Contracting Party of which such recipient is a national, corporation or association, upon the most favorable terms applicable to such currency at the time application therefor is filed, provided application is made within one year after receipt of the compensation to which it relates. The High Contracting Party allowing such withdrawal reserves the right, if it deems necessary, to allow such withdrawal in reasonable instalments over a period not to exceed three years.

3. The nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall throughout the territories of the other High Contracting Party receive protection and security with respect to the matters enumerated in paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article, upon compliance with the laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities, no less than the protection and security which is or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party and no less than that which is or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations of any third country.

4. The nationals, corporations, and associations of either High Contracting Party shall enjoy freedom of access to the courts of justice and to administrative tribunals and agencies in the territories of the other High Contracting Party, in all degrees of jurisdiction established by law, both in pursuit and in defense of their rights; shall be at liberty to choose and employ lawyers, interpreters and representatives in the prosecution and defense of their rights before such courts, tribunals and agencies; and shall be permitted to exercise all these rights and privileges, in conformity with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities, on terms no less favorable than the terms which are or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party and no less favorable than are or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations of any third country. Moreover, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party which do not have a permanent establishment, branch or agency within the territories of the other High Contracting Party shall be permitted to exercise the rights and privileges accorded by the preceding sentence upon the filing, at any time prior to appearance before such courts, tribunals or agencies, of reasonable particulars required by the laws and regulations of such other High Contracting Party without any requirement of registration or domestication. In the case of any controversy susceptible of settlement by arbitration, which involves nationals, corporations or associations of both High Contracting Parties and is covered by a written agreement for arbitration, such agreement shall be accorded full faith and credit by the courts within the territories of each High Contracting Party, and the award or decision of the arbitrators shall be accorded full faith and credit by the courts within the territories of the High Contracting Party in which it was rendered, provided the arbitration proceedings were conducted in good faith and in conformity with the agreement for arbitration.

ARTICLE VII

The dwellings, warehouses, factories, shops, and other places of business, and all premises thereto appertaining, of the nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party, located in the territories of the other High Contracting Party, shall not be subject to unlawful entry or molestation. There shall not be made any visit to, or any search of, any such dwellings, buildings or premises, nor shall any books, papers or accounts therein be examined or inspected, except under conditions and in conformity with procedure no less favorable than the conditions and procedures prescribed for nationals, corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party under laws and regulations enforced by the duly constituted authorities within the territories thereof. In no case shall the nationals, corporations or associations of either High Contracting Party in the territories of the other High Contracting Party be treated less favorably with respect to the foregoing matters than the nationals, corporations or associations of any third country. Any visit, search, examination or inspection which may be permissible under the exception stated in this Article shall be made with due regard for, and in such a way as to cause the least possible interference with, the occupants of such dwellings, buildings or premises or the ordinary conduct of any business or other enterprise.

ARTICLE VIII

1. The nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall be permitted to acquire, hold and dispose of real and other immovable property throughout the territories of the other High Contracting Party subject to the conditions and requirements as prescribed by the laws and regulations of such other High Contracting Party, and, subject to the provisions of the succeeding sentence, the treatment accorded to such nationals, corporations and associations shall not be less favorable than that accorded to nationals, corporations and associations of any third country. In the case of any state, territory or possession of the United States of America which does not now or does not hereafter permit the nationals, corporations and associations of the Republic of China to acquire, hold or dispose of real and other immovable property upon the same terms as nationals, corporations and associations of the United States of America, the provisions of the preceding sentence shall not apply. In that case, the Republic of China shall not be obligated to accord to nationals of the United States of America domiciled in, and to corporations and associations of the United States of America created or organized under the laws of, such state, territory or possession treatment more favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded within such state, territory or possession to nationals, corporations and associations of the Republic of China.

2. If a national, corporation or association of either High Contracting Party, whether or not resident and whether or not engaged in business or other activities within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, is on account of alienage prevented by the applicable laws and regulations within such territories from succeeding as devisee, or as heir in the case of a national, to real or other immovable property situated therein, or to interests in such property, then such national, corporation or association shall be allowed a term of three years in which to sell such property or interest, this term to be reasonably prolonged if circumstances render it necessary. The transmission or receipt of such property shall be exempt from the payment of any estate, succession, probate or administrative taxes or charges other or higher than those now or hereafter imposed in like cases upon the nationals, corporations or associations of the High Contracting Party in whose territory the property is or the interests therein are situated. Moreover, such devisee or heir shall, in conformity with such applicable laws and regulations as are not inconsistent with paragraph 3 of Article XIX, be permitted without interference to withdraw the proceeds of the sale of such property, by obtaining foreign exchange, in the currency of the High Contracting Party of which the devisee is a national, corporation or association, or of which the heir is a national, during a period not in excess of three years after application therefor, upon the most favorable terms applicable to such currency at the time application for the withdrawal of such proceeds is filed, provided such application is made within one year after receipt of the proceeds of sale to which it relates.

3. Nothing in paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article shall modify or supersede Article IV of the Treaty of January 11, 1943, between the United States of America and the Republic of China for the Relinquishment of Extraterritorial Rights in China and the Regulation of Related Matters or the paragraph relating to that Article in the exchange of notes accompanying that Treaty.

4. The nationals of either High Contracting Party shall have full power to dispose of personal property of every kind anywhere within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, by testament, donation or otherwise and their heirs, legatees or donees, being persons of whatever nationality or corporations or associations wherever created or organized, whether resident or non-resident and whether or not engaged in business within the territories of the High Contracting Party where such property is situated, shall succeed to such property, and shall be permitted to take possession thereof, either by themselves or by others acting for them, and to retain or dispose of it at their pleasure, exempt from any restrictions, taxes or charges other or higher than those to which the heirs, legatees or donees of nationals of such other High Contracting Party are or may hereafter be subject in like cases. The nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall be permitted to succeed, as heirs, legatees and donees, to personal property of every kind within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, left or given to them by nationals of such other High Contracting Party or by nationals of any third country, and shall be permitted to take possession thereof, either by themselves or by others acting for them, and to retain or dispose of it at their pleasure, exempt from any restrictions, taxes or charges other or higher than those to which the nationals, corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party are or may hereafter be subject in like cases. Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to affect the laws and regulations of either High Contracting Party prohibiting or restricting the direct or indirect ownership by aliens or foreign corporations and associations of the shares in, or instruments of indebtedness of, corporations and associations of such High Contracting Party carrying on particular types of activities.

5. The nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall, subject to the exception in paragraph 2 of Article X, receive treatment, in respect of all matters which relate to the acquisition, holding, leasing, possession or disposition of personal property, no less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be received by nationals, corporations and associations of any third country.

ARTICLE IX

The nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded within the territory of the other High Contracting Party effective protection in the exclusive use of inventions, trademarks and trade names, upon compliance with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, respecting registration and other formalities which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities; unauthorized manufacture, use or sale of such inventions, or imitation or falsification of such trademarks and trade names, shall be prohibited, and effective remedy therefor shall be provided by civil action. The nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded throughout the territory of the other High Contracting Party effective protection in the enjoyment of rights with respect to their literary and artistic works, upon compliance with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, respecting registration and other formalities which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities; unauthorized reproduction, sale, diffusion or use of such literary and artistic works shall be prohibited, and effective remedy therefor shall be provided by civil action. In any case, the nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall enjoy, throughout the territories of the other High Contracting Party, all rights and privileges of whatever nature in regard to copyrights, patents, trademarks, trade names, and other literary, artistic and industrial property, upon compliance with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, respecting registration and other formalities which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities, upon terms no less favorable than are or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party, and, in regard to patents, trademarks, trade names and other industrial property, upon terms no less favorable than are or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations of any third country.

ARTICLE X

1. The nationals of either High Contracting Party residing within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, and the nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party engaged in business or in scientific, educational, religious or philanthropic activities within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, shall not be subject to the payment of any internal taxes, fees or charges other or higher than those which are or may hereafter be imposed by laws and regulations enforced by the duly constituted authorities upon the nationals, corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party. Moreover, in the case of corporations and associations specified in the preceding sentence, such taxes, fees or charges shall not be imposed upon or measured by any income, property, capital or other criterion of measurement in excess of that reasonably allocable or apportionable to the territories of such other High Contracting Party.

2. The nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall not be subject to the payment of any internal taxes, fees or charges imposed by laws and regulations enforced by the duly constituted authorities within the territories of the other High Contracting Party other or higher than those which are or may hereafter be imposed upon the nationals, residents, corporations and associations of any third country, except that the foregoing provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to any advantage in respect of internal taxes, fees or charges which is or may hereafter be granted to the nationals, residents, corporations or associations of any third country, either (a) pursuant to legislation extending the same advantage to all countries, or to the nationals, residents, corporations or associations thereof, on the basis of reciprocity, or (b) in a treaty or other agreement concluded with such third country for the avoidance of double taxation or the mutual protection of revenue.

ARTICLE XI

Commercial travelers representing manufacturers, merchants and traders domiciled in the territories of either High Contracting Party shall, on their entry into and sojourn in the territories of the other High Contracting Party and on their departure therefrom, be accorded treatment no less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to commercial travelers of any third country in respect of customs and other privileges and, subject to the exception in paragraph 2 of Article X, in respect of all taxes and charges of whatever denomination applicable to them or to their samples.

ARTICLE XII

1. The nationals of either High Contracting Party shall, throughout the territories of the other High Contracting Party, be permitted to exercise liberty of conscience and freedom of worship and to establish schools for the education of their children, and they may, whether individually, collectively or in religious or educational corporations or associations, and without annoyance or molestation of any kind by reason of their religious belief or otherwise, conduct religious services and give religious or other instruction, either within their own houses or within any other appropriate buildings, provided that their religious and educational activities are not contrary to public morals and that their educational activities are conducted in conformity with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities.

2. The nationals of either High Contracting Party shall be permitted within the territories of the other High Contracting Party to bury their dead according to their religious customs in suitable and convenient places which are or may hereafter be established and maintained for the purpose, subject to the mortuary and sanitary laws and regulations, if any, which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities.

3. Places of worship and cemeteries shall be held in respect and free from disturbance or profanation.

ARTICLE XIII

With respect to that form of protection granted within the territories of either High Contracting Party by the applicable laws establishing civil liability for bodily injuries or for death, and giving to relatives or heirs or dependents of an injured person a right of action or a pecuniary compensation, such relatives or heirs or dependents of the injured person, himself a national of either High Contracting Party and injured within any of the territories of the other High Contracting Party, shall, regardless of their alienage or residence outside of the territory where the injury occurred, enjoy the same rights and privileges as are or may hereafter be granted under like conditions to nationals of such other High Contracting Party.

ARTICLE XIV

1. The nationals of each High Contracting Party shall be exempt from compulsory military or naval training or service under the jurisdiction of the other High Contracting Party, and shall also be exempt from all contributions in money or in kind imposed in lieu thereof.

2. During any period of time when both of the High Contracting Parties are, through military or naval action in connection with which there is general compulsory military or naval service, (a) enforcing measures against the same third country or countries in pursuance of obligations for the maintenance of international peace and security, or (b) concurrently conducting hostilities against the same third country or countries, provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article shall not apply. However, in such an event the nationals of either High Contracting Party in the territory of the other High Contracting Party, who have not declared their intention to acquire the nationality of such other High Contracting Party, shall be exempt from military or naval service under the jurisdiction of such other High Contracting Party if within a reasonable time prior to their induction for such service they elect, in lieu of such service, to enter the military or naval service of the High Contracting Party of which they are nationals. In any such situation the High Contracting Parties will make the necessary arrangements for giving effect to the provisions of this paragraph.

3. Nothing in this Article shall be construed to affect the right of either High Contracting Party to debar from acquiring its citizenship any person who seeks and obtains exemption in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 or 2 of this Article.

ARTICLE XV

The High Contracting Parties reaffirm their adherence to a program of purposes and policies, open to participation by all other countries of like mind, designed to bring about an expansion of international trade on a broad basis, and directed to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment and monopolistic restrictions in international commerce.

ARTICLE XVI

1. In all matters relating to (a) customs duties and subsidiary charges of every kind imposed on imports or exports and the method of levying such duties and charges, (b) the rules, formalities, and charges imposed in connection with the clearing of articles through the customs, and (c) the taxation, sale, distribution or use within the country of imported articles and of articles intended for exportation, each High Contracting Party shall accord to articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the other High Contracting Party, from whatever place arriving, or to articles destined for exportation to the territories of such other High Contracting Party, by whatever route, treatment no less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to like articles the growth, produce or manufacture of, or destined for, any third country. If the Government of either High Contracting Party requires documentary proof of origin of imported articles, the requirements imposed therefor shall be reasonable and shall not be such as to constitute an unnecessary hindrance to indirect trade.

2. With respect to the matters referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article, the nationals, corporations and associations, vessels and cargoes of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, treatment no less favorable than is or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations, vessels and cargoes of any third country. In all matters relating to (a) customs duties and subsidiary charges of every kind imposed on imports or exports and the method of levying such duties and charges, (b) the rules, formalities, and charges imposed in connection with the clearing of articles through the customs, and (c) taxation within the country of imported articles and of articles intended for exportation, the nationals, corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, treatment no less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party.

3. No prohibition or restriction of any kind shall be imposed by either High Contracting Party on the importation, sale, distribution or use of any article the growth, produce or manufacture of the other High Contracting Party, or on the exportation of any article destined for the territories of the other High Contracting Party, unless the importation, sale, distribution or use of the like article the growth, produce or manufacture of all third countries, or the exportation of the like article to all third countries, respectively, is similarly prohibited or restricted.

4. If the Government of either High Contracting Party imposes any quantitative regulation on the importation or exportation of any article, or on the sale, distribution or use of any imported article, it shall as a customary practice to give public notice of the total quantity or value of such article permitted to be imported, exported, sold, distributed or used during a specified period, and of any change in such quantity or value. Furthermore, if either High Contracting Party allots a share of such total quantity or value to any third country, it shall allot to the other High Contracting Party, with respect to any article in which the latter has an important interest, unless it is mutually agreed to dispense with such an allotment, a share based upon the proportion of the total quantity or value supplied by, or in the case of exports a share based upon the proportion exported to, the territories of such other High Contracting Party during a representative period, account being taken in so far as practicable of any special factors which may have affected or may be affecting the trade in that article. The provisions of this paragraph relating to imported articles shall also apply in respect of limitations upon the quantity or value of any article permitted to be imported free of duty or tax, or at a specified rate of duty or tax.

ARTICLE XVII

1. Laws, regulations of administrative authorities and decisions of administrative or judicial authorities of each High Contracting Party pertaining to the classification of articles for customs purposes or to rates of duty shall be published promptly in such a manner as to enable traders to become acquainted with them. Such laws, regulations and decisions shall be applied uniformly at all ports of the respective High Contracting Parties except as is or may hereafter be otherwise specifically provided for in statutes of either High Contracting Party with respect to the importation of articles into its insular territories and possessions.

2. No administrative ruling by the Government of either High Contracting Party effecting advances in rates of duties or charges applicable under an established and uniform practice to imports originating in the territories of the other High Contracting Party, or imposing any new requirement with respect to such importations, shall as a general rule be applied to articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the other High Contracting Party already en route at the time of publication thereof in accordance with paragraph 1; provided that, if either High Contracting Party customarily exempts from such new or increased obligations articles entered for consumption or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption during a period of thirty days after the date of such publication, such practice shall be considered full compliance with this paragraph. The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to administrative orders imposing antidumping duties, or relating to regulations for the protection of human, animal or plant life or health, or relating to public safety, or giving effect to judicial decisions.

3. Each High Contracting Party shall provide some procedure, administrative, judicial or otherwise, under which the nationals, corporations and associations of the other High Contracting Party, and importers of articles the growth, produce or manufacture of such other High Contracting Party, shall be permitted to appeal against fines and penalties imposed upon them by the customs authorities, confiscations by such authorities and rulings of such authorities on questions of customs classification and of valuation of articles for customs purposes. Greater than nominal penalties shall not be imposed by either High Contracting Party in connection with any importation by the nationals, corporations or associations of the other High Contracting Party, or in connection with the importation of articles the growth, produce or manufacture of such other High Contracting Party, because of errors in documentation which are obviously clerical in origin or with regard to which good faith can be established.

4. The Government of each High Contracting Party will accord sympathetic consideration to such representations as the Government of the other High Contracting Party may make with respect to the operation or administration of import or export prohibitions or restrictions, quantitave regulations, customs regulations or formalities, or sanitary laws or regulations for the protection of human, animal or plant life or health.

ARTICLE XVIII

1. Articles the growth, produce or manufacture of either High Contracting Party, imported into the territories of the other High Contracting Party, shall be accorded treatment with respect to all matters affecting internal taxation no less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to like articles the growth, produce or manufacture of such other High Contracting Party.

2. Articles grown, produced or manufactured within the territories of either High Contracting Party in whole or in part by nationals, corporations and associations of the other High Contracting Party, or by corporations and associations organized or participated in by such nationals, corporations and associations, shall be accorded within such territories treatment with respect to all matters affecting internal taxation, or exportation from such territories, no less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to like articles grown, produced or manufactured therein in whole or in part by nationals, corporations and associations of the High Contracting Party within the territories of which the articles are grown, produced or manufactured, or by corporations and associations organized or participated in by such nationals, corporations and associations. The articles specified in the preceding sentence shall not in any case receive treatment less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to like articles grown, produced or manufactured in whole or in part by nationals, corporations and associations of any third country, or by corporations and associations organized or participated in by such nationals, corporations and associations.

ARTICLE XIX

1. If the Government of either High Contracting Party establishes or maintains any form of control of the means of international payment or of international financial transactions, it shall accord fair and equitable treatment to the nationals, corporations and associations and commerce of the other High Contracting Party with respect to all aspects of such control.

2. The Government establishing or maintaining such control shall impose no prohibition, restriction or delay on the transfer of payment for any article the growth, produce or manufacture of the other High Contracting Party which is not imposed on the transfer of payment for the like article the growth, produce or manufacture of any third country. With respect to the rates of exchange and with respect to taxes or charges on exchange transactions, articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the other High Contracting Party shall be accorded treatment no less favorable than the treatment which is or many hereafter be accorded to like articles the growth, produce or manufacture of any third country. The provisions of this paragraph shall also extend to the application of such control to payments necessary for or incidental to the importation of articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the other High Contracting Party. In general, any such control shall be administered so as not to influence to the disadvantage of the other High Contracting Party the competitive relationships between articles the growth, produce or manufacture of such other High Contracting Party and like articles the growth, produce or manufacture of any third country.

3. In all that relates to the transfer of profits, dividends, interest, payments for imported articles, and of other funds, to loans and to any other international financial transactions, either between the territories of the two High Contracting Parties or between the territories of the High Contracting Party the Government of which establishes or maintains the control referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article and the territories of any third country, the Government establishing or maintaining the control shall accord to the nationals, corporations and associations of the other High Contracting Party treatment no less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to its own nationals, corporations and associations, and no less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations of any third country which make or receive like transfers and loans, and which are parties to like transactions, between the territories of the same two countries. Moreover, the Government establishing or maintaining such control shall accord to the nationals, corporations and associations of the other High Contracting Party, in all that relates to any such transfers, loans and other transactions between the territories of the two High Contracting Parties, treatment no less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations of any third country which make or receive like transfers and loans, and which are parties to like transactions, between the territories of the High Contracting Party the Government of which establishes or maintains the control and the territories of such third country. The treatment accorded by this paragraph shall apply to the rates of exchange and to any prohibition, restriction, delay, tax or other charge on the transfers, loans and other transactions covered by this paragraph; and such treatment shall apply whether the transfers, loans and other transactions take place directly or through an intermediary or intermediaries in a country or countries not parties to this Treaty. In general, any such control shall be administered so as not to influence to the disadvantage of the other High Contracting Party the competitive relationships between the nationals, corporations and associations of such other High Contracting Party and the nationals, corporations and associations of any third country.

ARTICLE XX

1. If the Government of either High Contracting Party establishes or maintains a monopoly or public agency for the importation, exportation, purchase, sale, distribution or production of any article, or grants exclusive privileges to any agency to import, export, purchase, sell, distribute or produce any article, such monopoly or agency shall accord to the commerce of the other High Contracting Party fair and equitable treatment in respect of its purchases of articles the growth, product or manufacture of foreign countries and its sales of articles destined for foreign countries. To this end the monopoly or agency shall, in making such purchases or sales of any article, be influenced solely by considerations, such as price, quality, marketability, transportation and terms of purchase or sale, which would ordinarily be taken into account by a private commercial enterprise interested solely in purchasing or selling such article on the most favorable terms. If the Government of either High Contracting Party establishes or maintains a monopoly or agency for the sale of any service or grants exclusive privileges to any agency to sell any service, such monopoly or agency shall accord fair and equitable treatment to the other High Contracting Party and to the nationals, corporations, associations and commerce thereof in respect of transactions involving such services as compared with the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to any third country and to the nationals, corporations, associations and commerce thereof.

2. The Government of each High Contracting Party, in the awarding of concessions and other contracts, and in the purchasing of supplies, shall accord fair and equitable treatment to the nationals, corporations and associations and to the commerce of the other High Contracting Party as compared with the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to the nationals, corporations and associations and to the commerce of any third country.

ARTICLE XXI

1. Between the territories of the High Contracting Parties there shall be freedom of commerce and navigation.

2. Vessels under the flag of either High Contracting Party, and carrying the papers required by its national law in proof of nationality, shall be deemed to be vessels of that High Contracting Party both within the ports, places and waters of the other High Contracting Party and on the high seas. As used in this Treaty, "vessels" shall be construed to include all vessels of either High Contracting Party whether privately owned or operated or publicly owned or operated. However, the provisions of this Treaty other than this paragraph and paragraph 5 of Article XXII shall not be construed to accord rights to vessels of war or fishing vessels of the other High Contracting Party; nor shall they be construed to extend to the nationals, corporations and associations, vessels and cargoes of, or to articles the growth, produce or manufacture of, such other High Contracting Party any special privileges restricted to national fisheries or to the products thereof.

3. The vessels of either High Contracting Party shall have liberty, equally with the vessels of any third country, to come with their cargoes to all ports, places and waters of the other High Contracting Party which are or may hereafter be open to foreign commerce and navigation.

ARTICLE XXII

1. The vessels and cargoes of either High Contracting Party shall, within the ports, places and waters of the other High Contracting Party, in all respects be accorded treatment no less favorable than the treatment accorded to the vessels and cargoes of such other High Contracting Party, irrespective of the port of departure or the port of destination of the vessel, and irrespective of the origin or the destination of the cargo.

2. No duties of tonnage, harbor, pilotage, lighthouse, quarantine, or other similar or corresponding duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or for the profit of the government, public functionaries, private individuals, corporations or establishments of any kind, shall be imposed in the ports, places and waters of either High Contracting Party upon the vessels of the other High Contracting Party, which shall not equally and under the same conditions be imposed upon national vessels.

3. No charges upon passengers, passenger fares or tickets, freight moneys paid or to be paid, bills of lading, contracts of insurance or re-insurance, no conditions relating to the employment of ship brokers, of whatever nationality, and no other charges or conditions of any kind, shall be imposed in a way tending to accord any advantage to vessels of either High Contracting Party as compared with the vessels of the other High Contracting Party.

4. Within the ports, places and waters of each High Contracting Party which are or may hereafter be open to foreign commerce and navigation, competent pilots shall be made available to take the vessels of the other High Contracting Party into and out of such ports, places and waters.

5. If a vessel of either High Contracting Party shall be forced by stress of weather or by reason of any other distress to take refuge in any of the ports, places or waters of the other High Contracting Party not open to foreign commerce and navigation, it shall receive friendly treatment and assistance and such supplies and materials for repair as may be necessary and available. This paragraph shall apply to vessels of war and fishing vessels, as well as to vessels as defined in paragraph 2 of Article XXI.

6. In no case shall the treatment accorded to the vessels and cargoes of either High Contracting Party with respect to the matters referred to in this Article be less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to the vessels and cargoes of any third country.

ARTICLE XXIII

1. It shall be permissible, in the vessels of either High Contracting Party, to import into the territories of the other High Contracting Party, or to export therefrom, all articles which it is or may hereafter be permissible to import into such territories, or to export therefrom, in the vessels of such other High Contracting Party, without being liable to any other or higher duties or charges whatsoever than if such articles were imported or exported in vessels of such other High Contracting Party.

2. Bounties, drawbacks and other privileges of this nature of whatever kind or denomination which are or may hereafter be allowed, in the territories of either High Contracting Party, on articles imported or exported in national vessels shall also and in like manner be allowed on articles imported or exported in vessels of the other High Contracting Party.

ARTICLE XXIV

1. Vessels of either High Contracting Party shall be permitted to discharge portions of cargoes at any ports, places or waters of the other High Contracting Party which are or may hereafter be open to foreign commerce and navigation, and to proceed with the remaining portions of such cargoes to any other such ports, places or waters, without paying other or higher tonnage dues or port charges in such cases than would be paid by national vessels in like circumstances, and they shall be permitted to load in like manner, in the same voyage outward, at the various ports, places and waters which are or may hereafter be open to foreign commerce and navigation. The vessels and cargoes of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded, with respect to the matters referred to in this paragraph, treatment in the ports, places and waters of the other High Contracting Party no less favorable than the treatment which is or may hereafter be accorded to the vessels and cargoes of any third country.

2. Should either High Contracting Party accord the rights of inland navigation or coasting trade to vessels of any third country such rights would similarly be accorded to the vessels of the other High Contracting Party. The coasting trade and inland navigation of each High Contracting Party are excepted from the requirement of national treatment and are to be regulated according to the laws of each High Contracting Party in relation thereto. It is agreed, however, that vessels of either High Contracting Party shall enjoy within the territory of the other High Contracting Party with respect to the coasting trade and inland navigation treatment as favorable as the treatment accorded to the vessels of any third country. Trade between either High Contracting Party and its insular territories or possessions shall be considered coasting trade within the meaning of this paragraph.

ARTICLE XXV

There shall be freedom of transit through the territories of each High Contracting Party by the routes most convenient for international transit (a) for persons, whether or not they are nationals of the other High Contracting Party, together with their baggage, directly or indirectly coming from or going to the territories of such other High Contracting Party, (b) for persons who are nationals of the other High Contracting Party, together with their baggage, regardless of whether they are coming from or going to the territories of such other High Contracting Party, and (c) for articles directly or indirectly coming from or going to the territories of such other High Contracting Party. Such persons, baggage and articles in transit shall not be subject to any transit duty, to any unnecessary delays or restrictions, or to any discrimination in respect of charges, facilities or any other matter; and all charges and regulations prescribed in respect of such persons, baggage or articles shall be reasonable, having regard to the conditions of the traffic. Except as may hereafter be agreed by the High Contracting Parties with respect to non-stop flight by aircraft, the Government of either High Contracting Party may require that such baggage and articles be entered at the proper customhouse and that they be kept in customs custody whether or not under bond; but such baggage and articles shall be exempt from all customs duties or similar charges if such requirements for entry and retention in customs custody are complied with and if they are exported within one year and satisfactory evidence of such exportation is presented to the customs authorities. Such nationals, baggage, persons and articles shall be accorded treatment with respect to all charges, rules and formalities in connection with transit no less favorable than the treatment accorded to the nationals of any third country, together with their baggage, or to persons and articles coming from or going to the territories of any third country.

ARTICLE XXVI

1. Nothing in this Treaty shall be construed to prevent the adoption or enforcement of measures:

(a) relating to the importation or exportation of gold or silver;

(b) relating to the traffic in arms, ammunition and implements of war, and, in exceptional circumstances, all other military supplies;

(c) relating to the exportation of national treasures of historical, archaeological or artistic value;

(d) necessary in pursuance of obligations for the maintenance of international peace and security, or for the protection of the essential interests of the country in time of national emergency; or

(e) imposing exchange restrictions in conformity with the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund, signed December 27, 1945, so long as the High Contracting Party imposing the restrictions is a member of the Fund, provided that neither High Contracting Party shall utilize its privileges under section 3 of Article VI or section 2 of Article XIV of such Agreement in such a manner as to impair any of the provisions of this Treaty.

2. Subject to the requirement that, under like circumstances and conditions, there shall be no arbitrary discrimination by either High Contracting Party against the other High Contracting Party or against the nationals, corporations, associations, vessels or commerce thereof, in favor of any third country or the nationals, corporations, associations, vessels or commerce thereof, the provisions of this Treaty shall not extend to prohibitions or restrictions:

(a) imposed on moral or humanitarian grounds;

(b) designed to protect human, animal, or plant life or health;

(c) relating to prison-made goods; or

(d) relating to the enforcement of police or revenue laws.

3. The provisions of this Treaty according treatment no less favorable than the treatment accorded to any third country shall not apply to:

(a) advantages which are or may hereafter be accorded to adjacent countries in order to facilitate frontier traffic;

(b) advantages accorded by virtue of a customs union of which either High Contracting Party may, after consultation with the Government of the other High Contracting Party, become a member so long as such advantages are not extended to any country which is not a member of such customs union; or

(c) advantages accorded to third countries pursuant to a multilateral convention of general applicability, including a trade area of substantial size, having as its objective the liberalization and promotion of international trade or other international economic intercourse, and open to adoption by all the United Nations.

4. The stipulations of this Treaty do not extend to advantages now accorded or which may hereafter be accorded by the United States of America, its territories or possessions or the Panama Canal Zone to one another, to the Republic of Cuba, or to the Republic of the Philippines. The provisions of this paragraph shall continue to apply in respect of any advantages which are or may hereafter be accorded by the United States of America, its territories or possessions or the Panama Canal Zone to one another, irrespective of any change which may take place in the political status of any of the territories or possessions of the United States of America.

5. The provisions of this Treaty shall not be construed to accord any rights or privileges to corporations and associations engaged in political activities or with respect to the organization of or participation in such corporations and associations. Moreover, each High Contracting Party reserves the right to deny any of the rights and privileges accorded by this Treaty to any corporation or association created or organized under the laws and regulations of the other High Contracting Party which is directly or indirectly owned or controlled through majority stock ownership or otherwise, by nationals, corporations or associations of any third country or countries.

ARTICLE XXVII

Subject to any limitation or exception provided in this Treaty or hereafter agreed upon between the Governments of the High Contracting Parties, the territories of the High Contracting Parties to which the provisions of this Treaty extend shall be understood to comprise all areas of land and water under the sovereignty or authority of either High Contracting Party, except the Panama Canal Zone.

ARTICLE XXVIII

Any dispute between the Governments of the two High Contracting Parties as to the interpretation or the application of this Treaty, which the High Contracting Parties can not satisfactorily adjust by diplomacy, shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice unless the High Contracting Parties shall agree to settlement by some other pacific means.
